If a Nebraska convict were taken into another state he might apply forthwith for a writ of habeas corpus and it would be taking big chances to determine whether it would hold or not. At the same time the suggestion has been made that it would not be an untold calamity to have the greater number of the penitentiary inmates get away, because they could be relied on to keep out of the state and the taxpayers would save money by being spared the expense of keeping them during the remainder of their senpeople, centrally located and easy of actences, which in most cases have served that purpose of inflicting severe punishment for the offenses committed.

That the state has a ticklish problem on its hands in its penitentiary dilemma is quite clear and instead of becoming simplified it seems to be more tangled than ever
