SAVED HORACE GREELEY'S LIFE Recollections of an Incident in Western History by One of the Participants.

What would have happened to Horace Greeley had not John H. Witter and party arrived opportunely on an historic scene on South pass, near the spot where now stands the town of Evanston, Wyo., on September 5, 18597

Perhaps the makers of history can answer; perhaps not. Certain it is that no one of them has yet told the story. And yet it has a most important bearing, politically, journalistically and philosophically on events since '59. party of disappointed homeseekers should have decided to lynch the famous New York editor at that comparatively early stage of his career. What significance does it assume when one puts on his thinking cap and tries to emulate the example of the historian who enlarges upon what might have been! What a difference it would have made had Horace Greeley been eliminated in

The thinker who follows events closely can but shudder at the possibilities And here is the untold story which has been ignored in all biographies of the great journalist and has not been previously told in the west: A party of restless men who had read

Mr. Greeley's glowing editorials of the "Go west, young man," style in the New the year 1859 to take his advice. September 9 of the same year found them wandering in the wilds of Wyoming, disome. They had been told to come to the Pike's Peak region, the new El Dorado

Unfortunately, they did not go far enough missing Cripple Creek altogether. Weary and tired, the emotion uppermost in their minds as they gazed on the endless sage brush on the Wyoming plains was one of disgust and a desire for vengeance on the man who had been instrumental in getting them into the hopeless plight. At this inopportune hour appeared Mr.

Greeley on the scene. He was making a tour of the west, traveling by sta cuers surrounded Greeley.

After a monumental effort quiet was restored and the wranging between the men speak, and he did. After the first few words he commanded attention, and held it until he had concluded his remarks. Such was the convincing force of his arguments that he succeeded in changing their opinion of the west and in making them decide to cast their fortunes with the new country. Finishing, he thanked them ceeded on his journey without further ado Some members of the lynching party are ing fortunes in the new country, and are today very thankful that they remained.
