ARTISTIC HINTS ON HYGIENE

Mrs. Providem Shows What Has Been Worked Out in Her Own Dining Room as an Example.

"Come in and see my son's latest contribution to our dietetic education artistically expressed," said Mrs. Providem, as she met Mrs. Preparom at the door ready for their Saturday morning marketing. "We were talking over our good Marion Harland's 'Breakfast Talk' a few mornings ago, in which she tells how prone we are to be late and hurried in the morning and inclined to be so cross that the breakfast table is almost a horror, and no one feels really pleasant until the body engine is stoked and the fire begins to burn. We did not agree that 'every man is a brute until he has had his morning coffee,' but we did all agree that a few vital acts on the part of ourselves to ourselves, and one, at least, to others, would start us out on our day's work with fuller capacity to do, and we agreed in a general way to mutually do those things. Only a general effort to carry out the suggestions has been made until this morning when we came down to breakfast we found this," and she pointed to the wall over the dining table.

Dining Room Decorations.

A handsomely made "poster" hung there; in the upper left hand corner was a crayon sketch of a smiling boy, bowing and holding up a glass of water. Alongside him the poster contained the words, "I drink to your health (and my own), the first thing in the morning in a glass of pure water." Just below this were pictures of two equally happy looking boys engaged in graceful and vigorous athletic exercise; their motto, running up and down around their arms, "Fifty gymnastic strokes, flexing and exercising every muscle." Then a graceful girl by the open window, erect with chest expanded, her motto, "Twenty-five deep breaths, pumping the morning air down to the bottom well of your lungs, clearing the respiratory passages of effete air and filling them with working oxygen."

Then a sketchy but striking likeness of father and mother, smilingly giving vent to "A word of greeting, sending all forth to a happy day's work."

Then a finger, pointing down to the breakfast table, its motto, "Right food, properly eaten, to keep our body engine running without friction."

Work of the Children.

"The children were all in the secret, but it was a total surprise to us," said Mrs. Providem; each one had suggested something, and Allen had designed and made the poster. Father and I, after listening to their happy explanations, began to think of our part in this happy effort to begin the day right; we must always have a happy smile, and that could only be a real one by obeying the four commandments; other than our special one. A glass of water, every muscle made flexible and active, twenty-five deep breaths—verily there was no chance for us to grow lazy and inactive and old if we did all that. Then there was the proper greeting for each one to send them out right. For me the task of putting before them "right food. But the children had set the pace and we were wowed as we would. Keep it just as they had agreed by their self-imposed conditions to do. We agreed that each one who did not fulfill all the requirements should put a confession into the little box hung below the poster, and at the Sunday morning meal these, should be read, and a penalty attached as the household might mutually agree. So here we are ready for action. At the end of a month we are to have a general report, each one contributing something to the report, telling of what benefit the poster has been and how we have fallen short, or what can be done to make it stronger yet."

Result of Warm Weather.

"Not having had any frosts so far, the past week or two of warm weather has kept the supply of vegetables and some of the later fruits on the markets longer than usual, and in such condition that they can be preserved or pickled still; usually they are watery and acid at this season, but this year that has not been the case with the home grown ones, and prices having been so high many who have not felt able to put up fruit or vegetables as much as usual can pick up something cheaper because of the likelihood of frost soon nipping them; so as long as this weather lasts melons, peppers, cucumbers, crab apples, tomatoes, onions, rhubarb, peaches, grapes, pears, corn, beans and things of this kind can still be put away for future use," said Mrs. Preparom. "All canned goods will be so high this year that if we can get anything cheap we would better put it up ourselves. It is not such hard work as many think to can up a small amount of corn or beans or beets if you have the cans with good covers and either a wash boiler or a large flat bottomed kettle in which you can set three or four cans filled with the cut corn, the beans broken up finely, packed in the cans close, filled with boiled water in which is put a spoonful of salt to a pint, screw on the covers loosely, set on a folded paper in the bottom of the kettle or boiler, fill with cold water as high as the cans will set straight in, and bring slowly to the boil, then boil, covering the kettle closely, for four or five hours, not letting it stop and replenishing with boiling water if necessary; let the cans cool gradually in the water, tightening them as much and as fast as possible, as the glass contracts in the cooling. In canning corn cut from the cob, scrape all the pulp off after putting the corn, and fill the cans full, packing it in with a granite spoon until there is no tiny air space left; put on the rubbers and screw on the tops loosely, but tight enough not to let the water get in and be sure the boiling continues for hours after it begins to boil in the kettle.

Dried Corn—Nice sweet corn can be dried and be almost if not quite equal to the canned corn. Cut and scrape from the cob corn that is just right for eating, spread on plates not over half an inch thick, and put in an oven hot enough to scald, but not to brown it. Cook in this way half an hour and then let it stand in a very slow oven or in the hot sun covered with netting or glass for about forty-eight hours, occasionally stirring it. When perfectly dry put in paper or cloth sacks in a dry place, when desired to use soak over night and cook as canned corn. This is a good way to put up a small amount of very nice corn that one may happen to have left over in buying for immediate eating.

Tomatoes Canned Whole—Select firm ripe tomatoes; immerse in boiling water and slip off the skins; pack closely in cans, fill with strained tomato juice brought to the boiling point, stand in kettle surrounded with hot water, bring to boiling point and boil twenty minutes, then seal, letting them stand in the water and screw the cover occasionally as the water cools, being very careful not to let it get at all loose.

Canned Stewed Tomatoes—Scald and peel the tomatoes, cook twenty minutes, pour off any superabundance of juice, season with salt, heat again to the boiling point, place a glass jar on a cloth in a tray, fill from the boiling kettle, screw on the cover quickly and continue tightening it until it is cold.

Preserved Citron or Watermelon Rind—Peel and cut the rind in small pieces of uniform size, lay in salted water for two hours, then in fresh, changing it several times for six or seven hours. Put on to boil in two quarts of water, to which add a level teaspoon of alum, bring to a boil, cook until tender, then lay in cold water.

To each pound of rind use three-quarters of a pound of sugar, add a small amount of water and when it is dissolved drain and add the rinds, cook fifteen minutes, drain out the rinds, pack in glass jars, add half the juice of a lemon and a piece of ginger root, broken in bits, to each pound of sugar, slicing in a small amount of the lemon rind. Cook the syrup until it is very thick and pour over the rinds and seal. If a large amount of ginger is used these are almost equal to preserved ginger.

Sweet Pickled Watermelon or Citron—Prepare as above, and when boiling down the syrup add a cup of vinegar to each two pounds of sugar. If desired cinnamon stick and whole cloves can be substituted for the ginger.

RYDER AND CHILD LABOR LAW

State Labor Commissioner Meets Committee and Employers of Labor.
At a conference Friday between John J. Ryder, state labor commissioner, and Rev. James Wise and Mrs. Trapper Smith of the state child labor inspection committee, it was decided to hold a meeting soon of the employers affected by the child labor law and those interested in its enforcement. Mr. Ryder will be present. It is the intention to arrive at a general understanding between the authorities and the employers of labor. As the child labor question vitally affects the schools, Superintendent Davidson will be asked to take part in the conference. Mr. Ryder will address the Nebraska Federation of Women's clubs on the subject of the child labor law at Hastings on October 19.

PROTEST AGAINST THE DUMP

Property Owners Appeal to District Court to Change Location of Refuse Pile.

Property owners living on Missouri avenue, South Omaha, have begun a fight in district court to compel the South Omaha authorities to change the location of the dump, which has been in use for over a year. John Ruthjen, William Atkinson and Charles Tracy, who live near the dump through their attorneys, Murdock and Hancock, Friday secured a restraining order from Judge Sutton to prevent the city dumping any more refuse on the Missouri avenue site until the case can be heard. In their petition they ask the injunction be made permanent.

Omaha, W. L. McClintock, health officer and John and William Saeger, garbage masters. It states they have caused filthy refuse to be deposited near the plaintiff's homes until the stench became so great they were unable to keep the doors and windows open. The city some time ago, it is asserted, acquired a dump facing the Missouri river and by ordinance prohibited the dumping of garbage at any other place in the city. In spite of this they say about January, 1906, the location of the dump was changed to the site near their homes. The case will be heard by Judge Kennedy, October 7.
