THE KEY TO THE SITUATION—BEE WANT ADS

CHINA IS MODERNIZING ITS WHOLE LANGUAGE

At Present the Language is Not Calculated to Express Scientific Terms.

That the Chinese are fully capable of comprehending the sciences and other more practical branches of learning as are Americans has been the experience of Prof. Morimer J. Brown, who is visiting at the George G. Wallace home, 350 Charles street, after two years of teaching chemistry in the Orient. Mr. Brown has been an instructor in Chihli Provincial Industrial college, located at Tien Tsin.

"These young men understand the sciences as readily as do the young men in the American colleges," said Mr. Brown. "But they are hindered when they go to put them in practice, by the nature of the old Chinese learning, which was essentially a theoretical education and was acquired for the pure joy of acquiring it and not with the idea of putting it to a practical use."

The institution with which Mr. Brown has been connected is one of the many educational institutions which the Chinese government has founded since boxer times. The recent origin of the "new education" in China accounts for the fact that of the 350 students in the school only about fifty are doing work the equivalent of college work in this country. The boys with whom Mr. Brown has worked are largely from the families of the well to do business men of the empire, and are possibly a bit above the average intelligence.

The work in chemistry, which was Mr. Brown's subject, as well as in the other sciences is done entirely in English. "The Chinese language is an idiographic one," Mr. Brown explains, "each figure standing for an idea, and for the ideas of science which have only come into China with the 'new education' there are no suitable characters. Thus it arises that all scientific teaching must be done in English until the Chinese modernize their language as have the Japanese."

"The Chinese government being an absolute monarchy, offers no protection to private enterprise. On this account most of the boys who are educated in science at Chihli go into the government service."

Mr. Brown graduated from the University of Nebraska in 1905 and after taking two years and a half of post-graduate work at Cornell university contracted with the Chinese government for two years of work there. Before leaving for the Orient he was married to Miss Mary Beth Wallace, whose parents the couple are now visiting after returning to this country by way of Siberia and Europe.
