Nebraska SUPREME COURT OPINIONS

Cases from Douglas County Passed On by State High Tribunal.

USHER DECISIONS UPHELD

(From a Staff Correspondent.) LINCOLN, Jan. 4.—(Special.)—Supreme court opinions this morning cover several damage suits from Douglas county, the Shellenberger murder case from Nemaha county, in which the district court is reversed, and the opinion of the court denying the application of John I. Taminosian, an Omaha merchant, to have his name, Mohammed Nadir, under which he was christened, restored.

Confession Properly Received

In the murder case of Fuller Shellenberger, who was found guilty of the murder of Julian Bahand in Nemaha county, and sentenced to imprisonment for life, the court holds that the confession voluntarily made by Shellenberger before arrest and before any accusation had been made, was properly received by the court in evidence.

THE MURDER CASE OF FULLER SHELLENBERGER

The court holds that the confession voluntarily made by Shellenberger before arrest and before any accusation had been made, was properly received by the court in evidence. The opinion which was written by Justice Letton also holds that "The defendant may be guilty, but the orderly and impartial administration of justice demand a chance to produce all the material evidence upon which he (Shellenberger) relies."

IRRIGATION CONVENTION AT SIDNEY NEXT WEEK

SIDNEY, Neb., Jan. 4.—(Special.)—Prominent among the attractive features on the program for the irrigation convention at Sidney, January 7, 8 and 9 will be a thorough and comprehensive study of irrigating by means of pumping plants in the valleys of Nebraska, by men who have studied this method of irrigation. Addresses will also be made by men prominent in irrigation circles, United States reclamation service and state agricultural schools. Sugar beet raising and alfalfa will receive considerable attention also.

COADS CONFER ON IRRIGATION

Visit General Land Office at Washington to Discuss Holdings in State of New Mexico.

APPOINTMENT SITUATION SAME

(From a Staff Correspondent.) WASHINGTON, Jan. 4.—(Special Telegram.)—Representative Lobbeck arrived in Washington this morning and with him came William J. Coad and Richard Coad of Omaha, who are large landholders in Wyoming and New Mexico. Today the Messrs. Coad had a conference at the general land office and with the representative of the geological survey with reference to their holdings in New Mexico, which they propose putting under irrigation.

Hearing on Lobbeck Bill

Mr. Lobbeck today attended the hearings now under way before the foreign relations committee of the house on the bills prohibiting the shipment of ammunition and war supplies to belligerent nations. Mr. Lobbeck has a bill somewhat similar in character to the Volmer and Barthold bills, upon which hearings are being held, but through some inadvertence, it was referred to the judiciary committee instead of to the committee on foreign relations. Mr. Lobbeck will be heard by the committee on the general subject of the bills at the hearing tomorrow.

Appointment Deadlock

Senator Hitchcock said today that he had nothing new to offer with reference to the deadlock on appointments in Nebraska. He had hoped to know something definite about his recommendation before this, but as Secretary Bryan had been absent in North Carolina, where the secretary has bought a tract of land for a summer as well as winter home, he could hardly expect him to take up the subject of appointments until the secretary's return.

Little Devil Does Any Work on Farm That Horse Will Do

The reputation of being the only tractor that will cultivate corn is enjoyed by the "Little Devil," the famous little three-wheeled gasoline tractor manufactured by the Hart-Parr company and now on exhibit at the Mid-West implement show at the Auditorium in Omaha. The Hart-Parr company believes in specialization, and they have specialized in the manufacture of tractors.

The original Hart-Parr engine was built by C. W. Hart twelve years ago. The "Little Devil" is a highly specialized evolution from that original machine. Ever since Mr. Hart can remember he believed he could build a better tractor than any one else. Even in college he worked his way through school by building and selling engines. He carried with him to the little town of Charles City, Ia., the belief that some day Iowa farmers would substitute the oil tractor for the horse. He dreamed rosy dreams, but never for an instant lost sight of the fact that it was work, not dreams alone, that accomplished things.

Somehow he managed to build his first tractor, but immediately was compelled to sell it in order to procure material for the next. Twelve years ago a company was organized, and in that year eighteen tractors were made. That seventeen of those are now in active operation speaks for itself for the quality of the product. In that twelve years the company has resisted all temptation to build anything but tractors. At this time they have on the market only five types, distinguished one from the other chiefly by differences in size, with consequent difference in horse power. They have now a machine that will enable the corn raising farmer of any state, whether he owns an eight-acre farm or an 8,000-acre one, to utilize the engine instead of the horse. The Hart-Parr people have eternally plugged away, as has Henry Ford in the auto business, to perfect one type. The "Little Devil" may be likened to the Ford automobile further. It sells for $250, and anyone who can run a Ford can also run a "Little Devil" tractor, so the company says.
