clusions. He finds that in Scotland and the Scotch islands, the percentage of cancer is particularly high in coal-burning districts, and low in peat-burning districts. There are some exceptions to this rule, and in every such case he finds that the peatburning district with a high death rate from cancer burns a peat with a high percentage of sulphur. Thus he concludes that coals and peats with a high sulphur content used as fuel have a direct connection with the development of cancer.
