An Heir at Large

Copyright, 1921, by The Chicago Tribune.

CHAPTER II. Would Miss Muriel Lannard look more favor upon Mr. Henry Livingston Bacon, heir to $15,000,000, than she had upon young Harry Bacon, struggling along on $2,500 a year? This was the hypothetical question which that young man, still staggered by the fact of his inheritance, put to himself as he sat in his room. Heretofore he could offer her nothing but love and a well established proficiency in pugilism—not a useful asset in married life—but now he could offer a wealth of things sufficiently overwhelming to make even her ambitious mother gasp.
