John F. Kirk Leaps From Plane, Piloted By Jack Atkinson, as Crowd Cheers -Says Drop Bad.

When John F. Kirk, parachute jumper, took off in a plane to make his drop at North Omaha field yesterday afternoon, John F. Kirk, Jr., aged 4, cried because he couldn't "go along with daddy."

Kirk gave his little son a parting bug as he stepped into the ship. Kirk fr., clung to his father until his mother pulled him away.

Son Cheers Daddy's "Drop." Son Cheers Daddy's Drop.

The mother and son watched intently as the ship, piloted by Jack Atkinson, soared higher and higher over the field. Mrs. Kirk's lips were tight as the ship seemed to poise in midair and her husband clambered over the side.

A sudden drop, then the parachute opened. Mrs. Kirk sighed v ith relief. Kirk, jr., cried with sheer joy as he saw his "daddy" descending gently earthward.

Kirk was quickly surrounded by an admiring crowd. His wife and son were on the outskirts, but not for long. Kirk, jr., crowded be-tween legs and reached his "daddy."

"A perfect drop, Kirk," congratulated someone,

"Not at all," denied Kirk, with a frown. "In fact it was a very poor It hurts my professional pride. I should have landed right in the middle of the field. I'm going to try it again right now, if I can get somebody to take me up." Kirk was dissuaded from making a second drop yesterday afternoon, however. He is an Omaha man, demonstrating parachutes made by the Scott Tent and Awning company. Ordinarily he is engaged in the prosaic business of running Auto Repair" company.

Horchem performed every "stunt" known to modern aviation during his flights, according to airmen watching him. He flew with the top of ship toward the earth; he went into tail spins at such a low altitude that veteran flyers held their breath;

"spiral leaf" drop, socalled, was one of Horchem's accomplishments. Buck Weaver, also flying a Laire Swallow, vied with Horchem in "stunt" flying.

Wing Walker Active.

Early in the afternoon Pat C. McCarty, "wing walker," took off with J. Hodgens Smith in a JN-4D. McCarty walked out on the lower plane of the ship, crawled to the upper plane, thence back to the tail, where he was perched when his ship landed. During this flight Pilot Smith did a "wing over" with Mc-Carty on the tip of a wing. The growd applauded when the ship came to a halt on the field.

John F. Kirk of Omaha made the only parachute drop of the afternoon. He took off in a ship piloted by Jack Atkinson, rising to a high altitude His parachute opened quickly and he descended slowly, landing at the north end of the field.

Clarence B. Coombs of New York is a happy youth today. Coombs didn't win the Pulitzer trophy race as he hoped he might but he still re tains his perfect health and there were many spectators at the north field Thursday, who shuddered whenver the Cactus Kitten came in view.

The Cactus Kitten is said to be the hardest ship to manage in the world. After the race Coombs admitted it was so "wild" he just let it go and made no attempt to Bank it sharply into the turns as the other pilots did. He had to jerk his ship around.

And as he landed there were many at the field, particularly those who knew something of the technique of the flying game, who held their
