My Marriage Problems

The Startling News Bess Dean Gave Madge at the Inn.

As the realization came to me that the hidden mysterious voice I had heard in the reservoir grounds was that of the man who calls himself Smith, who had later attempted to throw on us the blame for the attack on Trooper Crowley, I turned to Colonel Travers in frantic haste to undo the error into which the failure to function of my usually unerring memory had led me.

In my antagonism toward Smith, my fury at his insolence and arro-gance, I had given him a warning which might give him a chance to escape justice.

"Smith was the man in the reservoir grounds!" I cried. "I know it now. It was his voice I heard, beyond a doubt. Please telephone to your men at the inn to have him held at once, for-I-am afraid-he thinks we know." Colonel Travers rushed toward the Back to the Inn. He was gone but a minute or two, and when he returned there was a constraint in his manner which had not been there before.

"Hastings will get in touch with the men at the inn," he said, and I knew the reason for his manner. "Captain Hastings has told you that it was my own folly which warned him," I said. "That is too strong a word," he replied with perfunctory courtesy. "No, it isn't," I returned with a bitterness of spirit which I knew would long be with me. To think that I had allowed the insolence of this Smith to goad me into so glaring an indiscretion!

"My memory never played me a trick like that before," I went on futilely enough. "But his voice was so cleverly disguised-"He is one of the best mimics in the world," Colonel Travers interrupted, "so don't blame yourself
