Bedspread is Real Source of Artistry

BEDSPREADS are always a necessity that requires thought on the part of the particular housewife. They must be suitable for the rooms in which they are to be placed, minimize the laundry problem if possible, be decorative and up-to-date as well.

The once popular Marseilles spread is not considered decorative enough for the present-day housewife unless colored to match her rooms. Satine covered with dotted muslin having a ruffled edge and ribbon ties are popular for girls' rooms where laundry work is done at home. The lace all-over spreads may also be used when they can be done up in the house.

Linen, embroidered or stenciled spreads are fashionable just now. Some have appliqued floral patterns. Others have taken the form of the old-fashioned patchwork quilt. One spread that was much admired was done in the old Star of Bethlehem pattern, the star being white with pale blue

The candlewick spreads are rather more expensive than in the old en days, which does not seem to affect their purchase by those who have the four-post beds upon which to put them. In one instance, a woman had one of the spreads dyed a soft willow green, and the effect was charming Silk spreads are considered economical by many. They are cleaned by dipping in gasoline, which does not fade their volor or affect the embroidery upon them. But the original cost is more than many women feel they can put into a spread. Wash silk spreads are really the most practice—Adv.
