

My Marriage Problems

Adela Garrison's New Phase of "Revelations of a Wife"

The sound Madge heard behind her when Lillian drove away. "She's not particularly original," I commented idly, when Lillian had interpreted Bess Dean's early rising as a trip to the telegraph office. "Rita Brown did the same thing when we were down south."

"What else could the poor girl do," quoted Lillian, "save stage a fake telegram? Neither has any talent for facing failure or humiliation. But don't make the mistake of putting Rita Brown and Bess Dean into the same category. Of course, Bess is catty and vain, also she is very angry at you, and if there was ever a chance where she could do you some petty, purely feminine ill turn, she'd contrive the trick. There's no real villainy in her, however. But the other dame? I wouldn't trust her across the block. If she ever appears on your horizon again, you see that she is loathed, pronto."

"I'll look out for her," I promised. "But if you want to eat a decent breakfast before Col. Travers appears, I'd advise you to stop talking."

"Good enough advice, old-then-with-one-chicken," she retorted affectionately, and I fussedily watched her until she had discussed a good breakfast, for I knew that the officer's arrival would peremptorily put a period to any further thought of food. She had said that "the must not be kept waiting, for there is still work on hand," and she was not one to utter such words idly.

While They Waited.

It lacked five minutes of the hour named by Col. Travers when we finished, and we walked out to the veranda I noticed that Lillian took from her a motor coat of hers which hung in the hall ready for use, and put it over her arm. I looked quickly from the light sweater which she had on over her gown to the coat, wondering vaguely why she wanted it, as the morning was delightfully warm. But I knew better than to ask her the question and she vouchsafed no explanation, simply laid the coat over the railing of the veranda and seated herself in one of the big porch chairs.

"Is there anything in the world equal to the beauty of the morning sun upon these mountains?" she asked, dreamily.

"Unless it be moonlight upon the ocean," I countered, with a vivid memory of that never-to-be-forgotten sight.

"Getting homesick for the east end of Long Island?" she laughed.

"What Lillian Asked."

"A little," I confessed.

"I think myself it's nearly time we all went home," she said reflectively. "I'm ever so much better, and there are any number of things I ought to do. And, above all, there is Katie. I want to see that young woman."

I looked at her, wondering at her continued harping upon the subject of my little maid's queer behavior as reported by my mother-in-law's letter. She returned the look with a quizzical smile.

"I do take a lot of patience, don't I, Madge? But trust me, I'll tell you all I can as soon as I can."

"I don't mind anything, just so I am of real use to you," I assured her hastily, and then the noise of a rapidly driven motor, a little whirl of dust, a sudden slackening before the Cosgrove premises, a stop before the gate heralded the approach of Col. Travers. The officer himself was driving, and beside him sat Ted Cosgrove. As they alighted and came up the path together, I noticed that the boy was heavy-eyed from fatigue and lack of sleep, the interruption of his healthy boyish routine, while the officer—evidently used to catching sleep when he could get it, doing without it whenever necessary—was as fit as possible. I had not noticed in the stress of the evening before what a really handsome man he was, with his magnificent figure, clear complexion, a hat high colored, and black hair heavily tinged with gray.

His manner was faultless, too, as he bowed in acknowledgment of my introduction of him to Lillian. Then he spoke crisply but deferentially: "I have only a very few minutes, and our talk must be undisturbed. Can I talk to you where we will be sure of no interruption or possible listeners—of course, unintentional ones?" he amended hastily.

Lillian's answer was a question. "Can you drive and talk at the same time?"

She had thought it all out beforehand! I saw the meaning of the motor coat laid over the veranda railing.

Into Col. Travers' eyes flashed a gleam of admiration.

"Yes, and that is of course the best solution. How soon?"

"Now," Lillian rose and picked up the motor coat from the railing. The officer, with quick accustomed courtesy, took the coat and helped her into it. Another minute and they had walked to the car, entered it, and the officer was bending to the switch key.

Behind me I heard a sibilant intake of the breath, almost a gasp. I turned to see Robert Savarin, with face drained of all color and his eyes flaming.

Where It Started

Silhouettes are so called after Etienne de Silhouette, minister of finance of France in 1759. The name was given not because he invented them, but because they were cheap. Portraits made by tracing the outline of the shadow of the sitter were invented about that time, and as M. Silhouette was extremely parsimonious they were named Silhouettes in derision of their cheapness.

Mothers Awarded Damages

For Sons' Deaths in Cavein

Watertown, S. D., Dec. 9.—(Special Telegram).—Damages aggregating $9,000 and $4,500 each, were awarded by a jury in the circuit court here to Mrs. Emma Baxter and Mrs. Mary Dowd from H. A. Park, business man of this city, for the deaths of the women's sons, Orville Baxter and John J. Dowd, which they alleged were due to negligence on the part of Park in failing to keep the two little boys out of a basement for a new building which he was erecting. The boys were caught and killed by a cave-in of the dirt walls. Each of the mothers sought to recover $10,000 damages.

Antles Refuses to Revoke License of Ogallala Doctor

Lincoln, Dec. 9.—(Special Telegram).—H. H. Antles, secretary of the department of public welfare, declined to revoke the Nebraska license of Dr. E. P. Murdock, formerly of Ogallala. Citizens demanded the action, charging the physician with moral turpitude and drunkenness. A hearing on the charges was held last summer.

Jewel, Flower, Color Symbols for Today

By MILDRED MARSHALL.

The opal is today's alismatic stone, bringing its wearer good luck and brilliancy of mind. The superstition that it is unlucky should not be held against it on this day.

Today's natal stone is jade, believed by the Chinese to endow those born on an anniversary of today with long life, and the power to enjoy old age.

Green is today's color; though symbolic of joy and hope, it was believed by the ancients to be destructive to friendship.

The Japanese iris is today's flower; it protects from evil the home which it adorns.
