

My Marriage Problems

Adelle Garrison's New Phase of "REVELATIONS OF A WIFE"

The Way Madge Avoided a Quarrel With Dicky.

Irritation at Dicky topped my aspen-ment at his acuteness of perception concerning my unwillingness to leave the Cosgrove farmhouse before Bess Dean's departure.

My sentence, "I said with mendacious dignity, 'You would have learned that not Miss Dean, but your sister, Elizabeth, is the real reason for my wishing to delay in going home.'"

His face darkened. I knew the look. It was the "in-law" glance worn by most husbands and wives when the relatives upon the "other side" are being discussed.

"What's the matter with Lisa?" he demanded. "She's always been pretty decent to you."

star in her crown of rejoicing?" I retorted. "But, as it happens, I'm not denying her kindness and forbearance to an outlander. I'm simply looking at things in a common-sense way. You know very well that with Elizabeth and William and four children there, it will be most confusing for us to come in upon them."

I hurried nervously through my last words, for I was a trifle ashamed of the reference I had made to an old grudge of mine.

When Dicky and I were married, his mother and his sisters had been decidedly cool and lofty, with the evident attitude that the idolized male of the family had made a mess of things. All three of them in the years since then had tried to atone for their lack of cordiality, but I never had felt that Elizabeth's contrition was sincere.

My mother-in-law I had grown to love sincerely, and I felt distinct affection and admiration for Harriet Braithwaite, Dicky's elder sister. But Elizabeth Harrison—to outward appearance the sweetest-tempered, most placid of the three women—always had affected me adversely, and in my inmost heart I knew that I never had forgiven her for those long past slights, although I had tried to keep my feelings from my husband's knowledge as much as it was in feminine nature to do.

Dicky sprang to his feet, crossed the room, and towered above me, frowning.

"Comment me to a woman for digging old grudges from their graves," he said scathingly. "But if your sensitive soul is so wrung by the prospect of Lisa's proximity, why there is nothing more to be said. I'll wire her that you'd like to have her clear out before you get there."

That in a sudden gust of anger Dicky would be perfectly capable of doing the preposterous thing he had suggested I well knew. And I thoroughly appreciated the necessity of turning his anger in some other direction, or diverting him to good humor if it were possible to do so.

"Comment me to a man for twisting innocent remarks to suit his own convenience!" I retorted. "Because I am planning to save confusion, guard your mother from worry, and, incidentally, to keep you—the one who would most dislike the confusion—from a distasteful experience, you fly into a passion and plan to send an insulting message like that to your sister. As for this sudden hurry to go home, don't think you are misleading me. I am perfectly well aware that there will be no special attraction for you here after Bess Dean goes home."

I stopped abruptly, breathless, a trifle terrified, and bravely suppressing a desire to laugh. For Dicky's face was a study in bewilderment.

It is my pride that I have always kept any jealousy under such rigid control that Dicky could have no possible knowledge save his own keen intuitions that it existed. And I had had no need of suppressing any feeling concerning Bess Dean save a possible amazement at her audacity. That Dicky had fathomed my attitude toward her I was sure, and I appreciated to the full the bewildered surprise which was his at my outburst.

"Well, I'll be eternally boiled in oil if you aren't the outside limit!" he gasped. "Do you mean to tell me that you've taken seriously—"

"Something in my eyes must have betrayed me. He stopped short and looked at me steadily. Then, with a chuckle, he seized me by the shoulders and shook me with a burlesqued energy, his good humor palpably restored.

you were peeved at me for misunderstanding your desire to let Bess Dean fly the coop first, you drag Lisa in. Then, when you're afraid I'll spill the beans in that direction, you switch back and try to make me believe you're jealous. Darn it! I'd like to make you red-headed, crazy jealous of me just once. But you're too cold-bloodedly Puritan for that."

Red Cross

Mrs. A. C. Stokes leads the Omaha women workers in the fifth annual Red Cross drive. Mrs. Stokes, with her assistants, has covered five districts, and will work up others during the remaining two days. Those assisting Mrs. Stokes are Mesdames Charles M. Cook, Delia Cunningham, G. W. McConnell, Joseph Polcar, Henry Lemere, Clayton Goodrich, J. M. Shackelford, Henry Moehler, Fred Rogers, C. R.

Caughlan, W. M. Rutzen, L. D. Shipman and Will Hoagland.

Miss Mary Fitch, principal of Park school, sent $20 to campaign headquarters Thursday from memberships collected through the school. She reports the faculty of Park school has gone 100 per cent for the drive.

Mr. Frank Tremaine paid $5 for his Red Cross button when he learned that the money from this drive would go to the relief of disabled soldiers.

Little Miss Virginia Suchy of 1502 Ohn avenue is the youngest member of the Omaha chapter of the Red Cross. Virginia is but 12 days old. She joined the organization the first day of the drive.

One of the bell boys at the Rome hotel contributed his morning tips for his Red Cross membership button.
