Flu Germ Goes Right Through Stone Wall, Says N. Y. Expert

New York, Jan. 30 .- Five hundred monkeys have been used by health officials in New York and Washington the last two years in experiments looking to the development of vaccines against influenza Dr. William H. Park, of the New York health department, said today the experiments had been suggested during a meeting of medical authorities of the country in 1919. "We haven't learned anything about influenza," he said, "except that the invisible, unidentified organism which causes it, can pass through a stone wall. "The experiments on the monkeys have shown conclusively that if one is vaccinated he cannot contract pneumonia when innoculated with the germ, but that in the absence of vaccination, innoculation proves fatal in a majority of cases. Experiments on humans would bring the same results."

A Silly Song

The other day my wife said, "Kook, our cream check is too small. You'll have to wean that bunch of calves or sell them, that's I drove the cows into the barn and took the calves away and put them in a little shed and threw them in some hay. The pesky critters would not eat the feed I carried in; I gave them corn and oats and hay but they kept getting thin. My wife said, "Kook, you'll starve them calves, you lazy addlepate, Why don't you take them down some milk each time you separate?" That night I filled my pail with milk and beat it for the shed. I set the pail upon the ground and grabbed a heifer's head. I was a member of church but neighbors, passing by. o'erheard the conversation between those calves and I. Next Sunday at the meeting house, the parson made it plain that I and all the elders after meeting would remain. They took away my letter and handed me my hat and now I am a heathen but the calves are getting fat.
