Value of Indian Cornmeal as Food

Market for Surplus American Crop Opened as Result of Famine and Relief Measures.

By HOLLAND. When Ireland was suffering 70 years ago from famine and appeals were made to the United States to send food the response was instantaneous and abundant. A considerable part of the food which was sent to the famine-stricken people of Ireland consisted of cornmeal. It was eagerly accepted and freely eaten, but in a little while pestilence began which was unusually fatal. The Irish people attributed it to the eating of American cornmeal, although this was found to be a mistake. Investigation not to be the fact. There would have been pestilence had not a particle of cornmeal been eaten by the Irish people. However, the belief prevailed that American cornmeal was dangerous, and it was many years not a bushel of it was sold in Ireland.
