Candidate Has Only Own Money to Spend

George W. Sterling of Omaha, who has filed as a republican candidate for governor, lives at 2107 Farnam street.

Sterling has been a resident of Omaha 14 years. He came to Nebraska in 1892 when he entered the employ of the Union Pacific as a brakeman working out of North Platte. Injured in an accident, he retired from railroad work and went to Lincoln, where for seven years he was a deputy health officer.

Last winter Sterling managed a roller skating rink at Twenty-fifth and Farnam streets.

He explains that he is running for governor "on his own." "Nobody is behind me and I have no money to spend except my own, which isn't much," said Sterling.

He opposes the code bill and Gus Hyers and thinks the people ought to have a chance to vote on light wines and beer, he says.

Improved Conditions for Farmers Reported

Washington, May 10.—Farm operations, hindered for many weeks by wet and cold weather, made better progress in almost all agricultural sections of the country during the week ending yesterday, the weather bureau reported in its weekly weather and crop review.

Winter wheat continued to make satisfactory advances generally and was much helped by showers. Conditions were favorable for field work and germination in the spring wheat belt, with the result that seeding has been mostly completed.

Oats acreage was reported as considerably decreased because of unfavorable conditions for seeding. Preparation of corn ground, the bureau reports, made steady progress in most northern and eastern sections, although there was further delay because of heavy rains in the Ohio valley and the southwest.

Good Gains Are Made by Steers in Stanton County

R. A. Freiberg of Stanton brought in a choice load of heavy Hereford and Shorthorn steers to the Omaha market that averaged 1,398 pounds for which he received $8.60 a hundred. He said the cattle were bought here last November at $6 a hundred and had made splendid gains of about 934 pounds each, and that he was quite satisfied with his profits. He said the cattle were fattened on straight corn and alfalfa.

The Dancing Master

By RUBY AYRES. (Copyright, 1922.)

(Continued From Yesterday.) How easily people were deceived! Or was she growing clever, that she could so well hide her own despair? "Some day, if I go on like this, I shall forget him," was the thought with which she consoled herself. "Some day the pain will go, and I shall care no more."

So it was a shock to her to find a letter lying waiting for her in the hall, and to recognize Netta Stacey's writing.

She felt cold as she opened it and read the few penciled lines. "I'm writing in a great hurry," Netta wrote. "My dear, I've had an awful time. We saw you a fortnight ago. Pat has been most dreadfully ill, and still is; but I can't tell you in a letter. Can I come and see you? Drop me a line to Mrs. Silcum's and say when I can come."

Yours ever, Netta. Elizabeth went round at Mrs. Silcum's the following morning before Netta was up.

She forgot what Netta might think, and if she had remembered she would not have cared. Royston was ill—that was enough for her. She had not closed her eyes all night.

Mrs. Silcum exclaimed loudly when she saw her: "Law, miss! What is the matter? But I'm that glad to see you."

"There is nothing the matter," Elizabeth said hurriedly. "I want to see Miss Stacey, that's all. Can I go up?" She passed Mrs. Silcum without waiting for a reply, then remembering turned and looked back at her with a waning smile; "I'm glad to see you, too," she said. "I'll come down and talk to you in a minute."

She flew up the stairs to Netta's bedroom and knocked twice before a sleepy voice bade her enter. But when she opened the door Netta was apparently fast asleep again.

Elizabeth bent over and touched her shoulder. "Netta!" Netta sat up with a violent start. She looked pale and ill, and her eyes were heavy from want of sleep. She stared for a moment; then laughed. "You! Heavens! Is anything the matter?" she asked.

"I got your letter, and I came in a hurry," Elizabeth said. "Netta—he is he very ill?" Netta was fully awake now. She flung her rough hair back from her face and looked at Elizabeth with accusing eyes. Then she said abruptly: "What's it matter to you if he is?"

"Nothing—at least—you wrote and asked to see me, so I came," Elizabeth answered incoherently, hardly knowing what she said. She was very pale and her lips quivered.

"He is ill, very ill," Netta said sharply. "They say he ought to have an operation but he won't hear of it—says he can't stand it, and stuff like that. They've patched him up for the time being, but the doctor says he'll get ill again if he goes on dancing." She flung the bedclothes back, and slipped to the floor with an impatient movement. "I've overslept; here, talk to me while I get dressed."

She began brushing her hair, and Elizabeth sat on the side of the bed watching her dumbly. At last: "Where is he?" she asked faintly.

"In his rooms, of course. Where do you think he is?" was Netta's tart retort. "In a Park Lane nursing home?" Her voice was bitterly sarcastic; she began tearing ruthlessly at the tangles in her hair. "He'd have died if it hadn't been for me, though I say it," she went on with suppressed savagery. "There was nobody but his landlady woman to do a thing for him, and she was no good. His wife never went near him—hateful beast! I loathe her! She wrung every shilling out of him, and now she doesn't care what becomes of him."

She looked Elizabeth full in the eyes. "I'm wondering if you're the same," she said deliberately. Elizabeth gave a stifled cry and sprang to her feet.

"If I'm the same? What do you mean?" she asked shrilly. "What?" Netta reiterated. "Pat loves you—no, he didn't tell me," she added with a mirthless laugh, as Elizabeth would have spoken. "I just found it out for myself. He loves you, and he's never been the same man since you went to the Central woman. He's never said a word about you to me, but I saw—that day down at the inn, when you were with Farmer. I'm not such a fool but that I can understand."

Hairs Will Vanish After This Treatment

(Toilet Helps) You can keep your arms, neck or face free from hair or fuzz by the occasional use of plain delatone and in using it you need have no fear of marring or injuring the skin. A thick paste is made by mixing some of the powdered delatone with water. Then spread on the hairs and after 2 or 3 minutes rub off, wash the skin and all traces of hair have vanished. Be careful, however, to get real delatone.

RADIO

Radio to Displace Cable, Says Expert

Constant Interference Will Make Wireless Unfit for Phone Communication.

Will radio displace the telephone? This is a question of a great deal of debate and is most frequently answerable in the negative, according to Prof. T. B. Brown, instructor at George Washington university.

Because of constant interference, it would be out of the question to even try to handle phone calls by radio, stated Prof. Brown. However, he stated that he believed there would never be another cable laid to join foreign countries in communication, because of the certainty that wireless will soon supplant that means of communication.

Radio Education. "The field calls for radio engineers," declared Prof. Brown, "and it is apparent that if the development of the art progresses as rapidly in the next six months as it has heretofore it is doubtful whether the demand for these specialists can be met. The designing of the apparatus and the actual work of the installation is a most vital consideration for large stations, as the equipment and connections must be as nearly perfect as possible."

It is the belief of Prof. Brown that universities throughout the country will establish special courses in radio.

SPARKS

If the very best is desired in a set that employs variable condensers for tuning, get condensers that have verniers built in. These are two-plate condensers, mounted directly on the main shaft and controlled by a separate arm. Rough adjustments are made on the big condensers, and very fine regulation is made with the verniers. The latter, before being touched, should be kept in half way, so that adjustments can be made either way, as necessary.

Too much emphasis can not be laid on the importance or the necessity of the right value of the grid leak. If it is not correct the set will howl unmercifully. Do not buy grid condensers with the leaks already built in. Buy a separate grid condenser, and either make or buy a leak that can be varied easily, such as the pencil-line type. If the set does howl, try rubbing out some of the lines, and if the set doesn't work the way you think it should, try rubbing some more on.

QUESTIONS

V. S. B., Tobias, Neb. Q. (1) I have one ground wire from a cistern direct to my set, and another to a lightning switch. Is there danger of lightning jumping from one ground to another and then to the set? The grounds are six feet apart. (2) I have a single wire antenna 100 feet long and receive from all directions but do not get any signal that are close. Will another antenna help? If so, what angle is best to the other antenna? (3) Does antenna around a room give better results than the top aerial? (4) Will a variometer help to tune finer on a large loose coupler? (5) No, but why the two grounds? (6) Another antenna will help if you run it at right angle to the one that are close. (7) Yes, and use No. 18 enameled wire. (8) Yes, but with little better results.

James Pearson, Salem, Neb. Q. Can you tell me how to overcome interference which is a pole-charger on telephone lines? A. Try changing your aerial to run at right angles to other lines.
