SHIPS THAT PASS IN THE NIGHT.

"Ships That Pass in the Night," by Beatrice Harraden, is now enjoying unusual popularity. It has already been translated into three languages.

The plot is laid in Petershof, and to any one who has spent a winter in the Tennessee mountains, or in California, it presents a realistic picture. Each boarder has an ailment of some kind and wishes to monopolize the conversation with a discription of the peculiarities of his lungs and throat.

Bernardine, the heroiné, is a person whose energy, like a fire in her veins, fairly devours her life. It is not until health has left her that she, like the "Disagreeable Man," and the other inmates of the hotel realize the blessing of an active life, full of work. In the course of time the "Disagreeable Man," who turns out to be not altogether disagreeable, falls in love with Bernardine; but they are not as is the usual case—

"Married amid tears and laughter
And live happy ever after."

And this is the climax of the story. The author has done some philosophizing, but, as it is carried on in a conversational manner, it is never heavy. True knowledge is found in our every day life, and failure after the lapse of years is often called success. These are not new thoughts, yet the writer has told them so beautifully in the form of short allegories that one is impressed and pleased. There certainly is a great deal of heart and some humor in the book, and these two things seem the best that life can offer, and therefore desiderata in fiction, a colored picture of real life. C.

Peculiar to Itself.

So eminently successful has Hood's Sarsaparilla been that many leading citizens from all over the United States furnish testimonials of cures which seem almost miraculous. Hood's Sarsaparilla is not an accident, but the ripe fruit of industry and study. It possesses merit "peculiar to itself."
