"His Grace"

The scion of a house of kingly blood
I met, Dame Fortune's favored child, whose name
The plodding millions used synonymous
With wealth and power and fame.
Behind the pomp and splendor of his life
I saw the hopeless eyes, the haggard face,
Deep lined with care, and did not envy him—"His Grace."

Poised on the portico I saw her stand, Waiting for him who swiftly toward her came,
Confident, eager for the welcoming words
Which I could never claim.
Up the worn steps he sprang with hasty feet.
To where, above, he stood with smiling face;
I watched him go and deeply envied
him—"His Grace."

Unidentified

The following misconception of the art of poetry mysteriously found its way to our copy-book, and we can find no one who would risk assuming the responsibility for it. So being unable to find out who the perpetrator was, we publish his production in hopes that it may lead to the revelation of his identity and final conviction:

"I've found the missing link!"
Cried the youth wild with delight,
Earth stopped in her orbit
Wrapt with swift descending night.

The stars fled from their courses
Through the great abyss of space;
The sun stopped still in wonder
And gloom o'erspread his face.

"I've found the missing link!"
Cried the mad youth once again,
"The link of my sleeve button,
Which turns my loss to gain."

A Lady's Hat.

In the classroom you are seated.
What of that?
Ah, perhaps you are defeated
By a hat.
Then you twist yourself askew
And you wonder what to do,
For you never can see through
A lady's hat.

Now of course you are perplexed.
That is plain.
Though your neighbor may be vexed,
You refrain.
For the Co-Ed is so sweet
That you think it indiscreet
To remonstrate at her feet,
Or complain.

The Death of Leaves

There was no outcry as they fluttered down,
There was no agony of doubt or fear;
Without a protest and without a tear,
The trusting leaves have gone, without a sound,
Down to the bosom of the unknown ground. L. S.
