The young men students at 500 No. 11th street held a holiday celebration last evening. About fifteen guests were present, and spent a most enjoyable evening. Mr. Golden acted in the capacity of master of ceremonies, while "Tut" Charlton presided as toastmaster. The company was entertained in various pleasing ways and did not break up until a late hour.

A revised edition of Dr. A. F. W. Schwimper's "Plant Geography upon a Physiological basis," is being made by some of the leading botanists of the University at Edinburgh, Scotland, and other continental universities, in which appears a photograph of the Bad Lands of South Dakota taken by Professor Barbour of the geological department. It should be a source of some pride to find our University recognized in such a prominent work.

The Armstrong Store is a very pretty place now. Its wealth of holiday goods makes it so. We pride ourselves on having something at least a little better than elsewhere. Service is a partner with prettiness in the gifts you get here. There are a great many things shown that your relatives and friends would like very much to have. Take some of them home with you when you begin the Christmas holiday vacation.

Christmas

Many worthy people regard the approach of the Holiday season with apprehension, and are sincerely thankful that "Christmas comes but once a year." Past experience has taught them that the hallowed season is, to them at least, a period of care and worry. They have to face the problem of selecting suitable gifts for numerous relatives and friends—a task which renders it necessary for them to face the horrors of Christmas shopping. No wonder they rejoice in the prospect of a period of rest. Our patrons will, we trust, save themselves much trouble and worry and avoid the inevitable rush by selecting their Christmas presents now. They will be able to make much more favorable selections than if they wait until the choicest goods are gone.
