Editorial Remarks

The end of the year is approaching and we find it necessary to ask those who have not paid their subscriptions to attend to the matter at once. We must use urgency in making this request, as the money will be needed in making our ledger balance. Money will be received at either our office or at the Co-Op.

The Annual May Outing seems to be a much better sounding name than Senior Sneak Day, and the appropriateness of such a change is apparent. It is well that the Senior should depart in secret when they go on an excursion, but they need not leave behind any undignified impression as to their manner of going. The very term "Sneak Day" has deterred members of the faculty from giving assent to students skipping classes to go on the annual excursion, and by changing the name the objections of many can be overcome. If a little more dignity is lent to the occasion it will probably find its way into the calendar as a regular holiday, officially recognized by University authorities. Such a thing would be an advantage to the Seniors, so by all means let the occasion hereafter be known as the Annual May Outing.

Views derogatory to the general intent and purpose of the Rhodes scholarship behest have not been plentiful, and such a view coming from Professor Goldwin Smith, a prominent English authority is decidedly interesting. In discussing the matter Professor Smith says in a recent issue of the Independent:

"I must confess that my opinion of Mr. Rhodes, and of the effect of his doing on the honor of my country, are not such as to make me greatly rejoice in seeing my university welcome his largess and make itself a monument of his fame. Besides, the main object of the scheme is apparently political; and it is not very pleasant to see education made the vehicle of political propaganda of any kind. However, setting that aside, I can not help rather wishing that Mr. Rhodes had simply given his money to the university, which happens to be now rather in sore need of benefactions. British millionaires not being so bountiful to universities as are their counterparts in the United States, I fail to see what object there is in sending an American youth of promise to complete his education in England instead of completing it in his own country. The leading universities of the United States I believe to be now fully on a par with those of England, probably those of any country in Europe. The American universities, thanks to the increasing liberality of benefactors, are drawing to them some of the best European teachers. There is no very apparent advantage in estranging a young man from his country and imbuing him with ideas and aspirations different from those of the people among whom his life will be spent.

That there is a difference between the character of the American and that of the English student will probably be admitted by any one who has had to deal with both."

Law Student Obligated to Leave.

The following article in the Omaha World-Herald, will prove of interest to the friends of the young man concerned:

"Will Coryell, a graduate of the Omaha high school two years ago, and a student at the State University Law school, has broken down in health from overwork, and is suffering a severe attack of brain fever. Young Coryell has been undertaking considerable work for an eastern publishing house, and has been selling books in addition to the work of the law school. He went to Grand Island a few days ago to deliver some books and work up some new business there, when he was seized with a wild attack of delirium, and his mother, Mrs. H. B. Coryell, was immediately sent for.

"Coryell's room mate stated that he had been troubled with insomnia, doing a great deal of writing late at night, and in the early morning when sleep would not come to him. The physician regarded his case as serious and he was immediately removed to St. Francis hospital. Mrs. Coryell, who was in the midst of moving from Denver to Omaha, brought him with her to this city, and will have him at the old home as soon as possible.

"Will Coryell was captain of his cadet company at the high school and was one of the most popular Omaha lads during his residence here. He had been out west and in Denver since his graduation from the high school, and last January entered the law school at the State University."

Sophomore Program at Chapel

The Sophomores gave their program at chapel yesterday morning, with President Smith in the chair. The devotional exercises were led by J. C. Moore, and some good music selections together with a reading, were given by other members of the class.

The time expired before they had time to complete their program, but what was rendered was certainly appreciated.

Following is the program as rendered:
Instrumental solo—Helen Dolson
Reading—Grace Roper
Vocal solo—Harry Wharton
