In the September "Report of the Climate and Crop Service of the United States Weather Bureau" Edward A. Bessey, '96, and Carl Bessey, '97, publish an article on "Living Thermometers," in which they record their observations on the tree cricket for the past six or seven years. This cricket chirps quite commonly in summer and autumn evenings, and they find that the rapidity of chirping is directly proportional to the temperature. It is very easy to tell the exact temperature by counting the chirps, and applying the formula which they give.
