In the March "Arena" Radolph Blankenburg describes the ripening and revealing of political corruption in Pennsylvania under the Quay regime. This paper contains the startling expose of the criminal acts of Senator Quay which threatened to land him in the penitentiary; and the interest in the recital is much heightened by the reproduction of telegrams and autograph letters. There are also a number of portraits of men who figured conspicuously in this great drama of modern political corruption. Mr. Blankenburg's series of papers is probably the most important contribution to the literature of the new crusade for political morality of the present year.
