

DEATH-KNELL OF LATIN SOUNDED BY UNIVERSITY

Latin, that nightmare of the high school student, is gradually losing its prominence in the curriculum of secondary schools of Nebraska, and no longer will a high school freshman be forced to delve into the mysterious speech of the ancients. He will not be forced to, but he will be asked to, and in many schools it will amount to the same thing.

Latin, which a few years ago was considered essential to a cultured man or woman, is not regarded so now, and the high school course for the coming year to be sent out from the inspector's office of the university will provide that six hours credit in foreign languages will be required to enter the University and Latin will not be mentioned.

Mathematics does not hold its former high place in the requirements to enter the university, and beginning next fall four credits in this study will be sufficient, where formerly five were required. In place of the semester of the mathematics, laboratory sciences are substituted. It is strongly recommended that the student have two years of the classics, but next year, for the first time, German or any other foreign language may be substituted.

A table of entrance requirements to be effective September 1, 1912, shows that thirty entrance credits will be necessary for full University registration in place of the twenty-eight of last year. The latter number will allow the student conditional admission. Of the required subjects, four points of English, two points of European history, six of foreign language, four of mathematics and two of laboratory science are listed. The other twelve credits to secure University registration are any subjects "taught in an approved manner in an accredited secondary school." This latter is somewhat of a concession, and in former years only certain studies would be allowed for entrance.
