COMMITTEE FORMULATES PLANS

Seniors Will Obtain Necessary Information from 15 Schools—Drake Facing Similar Problem.

The committee of five seniors appointed to ascertain the practicability and need of a student council, met last evening and formulated plans to enable them to gather the desired information from other schools. According to present plans they will investigate the systems of student government in about 150 schools, from all parts of the United States. The committee will then present the salient points of the information in such a manner that it can be readily understood by everyone, whether acquainted with the subject or not.

Drake has been puzzling over the same question of late, and during the holidays the librarian made a collection of various articles on student government, including some twenty volumes varying from "Proceedings of the National Educational Association" to articles in the more popular articles.

kinds are solicited and all those who have any of the informal photos are requested to bring them to the Rag office and drop them into the Cornhusker box.

Swift asserts that with the pictures all in on schedule time, the publication will make its formal appearance about the first of May. The book will be full of the best obtainable in the way of contributions and pictures, the snapshot department will be one of the big features of the 1914 book. The prediction is that the new Cornhusker will be the best that the students have ever seen at the university.

For the benefit of those who have not had their pictures taken for the book, Swift announces that arrangements have been made whereby Townsend will receive the tardy ones until January 24. It is urged that the juniors and seniors who have not had their pictures taken as yet attend to it at once as the time is limited.

AMUSEMENTS

James K. Hackett will appear at the Oliver theatre, Monday, Jan. 12 in "The Grain of Dust," a play that he has established as one of the most pronounced successes of the past few seasons.

A slight story of the play is as follows, and concerns Frederick Norman, who is a member of a New York firm—the junior member, yet conceded to be its most vital force—he has grappled with mighty problems of corporation law, and has become a past master in the art of looking in a cold blooded way upon the crushing results of business and upon Josephine Burroughs, daughter of the firm's chief client, and the girl he was supposed to marry, in the same way.

He realizes suddenly, after months of fighting, that Dorothy Hallowell, a stenographer in his firm's employ, has cast a spell over him that he cannot escape. In spite of the pleadings of his own family, of his business associates and of other friends, he gives up the woman of his own social status, sacrifices his legal connection and places himself on a footing with the little stenographer. Later he breaks with his law partners that he may win the girl for his wife. Burroughs in the meantime threatens him for casting his daughter Josephine aside. True to his revengeful prophesy he has brought the young man to the brink of failure. All that Norman has attempted, after leaving the firm, has resulted in failure, but at the moment when things look blackest, a client the enemy of Burroughs, gives Norman carte blanche in a fight against the latter, and snatches him back from absolute bankruptcy by means of a large retainer.

Those who like a play of purely American motives, development and inspiration, treated in a broad and powerful manner typically American and portraying purely American types, will enjoy Shipman's dramatization of Graham Phillips' powerful story.
