ON REMOVAL.

The question of the location of the university is one which the taxpayers of the state are to settle. There are interests at work continually, attempt ing to prove the one or the other site the better. And the final decision will be given by voters, many of whom have never seen the university campus. They will vote, but merely on another per-on's say-so. They cannot know the real circumstances, nor ap preciate fully the good and bad points of either plan. How they will vote depends largely upon the advertising which is given, thru the state press, from the platform, and in conversation.

The question is, then, just where do the students come in? Their vote is but a drop in the bucket. They are divided, furthermore, as to the policy which should be followed. A large number of them do not really know why they believe as they do. They imagine the campus as it would be in the city or at the farm, and guess they'd like to see it one way or the other-any way to improve on present conditions. This is no time for a student publication to take issue on one side or the other of the proposition. The student body itself realizes that to move from the present campus means the abandonment of a costly equipment. It also realizes that at the farm, a higger and possibly better campus could be built up. In the event of removal, some of the present problems, such as the scattering of students throot the city and thel ack of unity, might be met. But at this time, it is rather for the student publications to fall in with the university publications in maintaining a neutral
