The Value of Thrift

When a young man comes into a bank and says, "I am thinking of going into business and want to see if I can borrow a little money," the banker says: "What have you got to start in business with?" "I have saved from my earnings regularly since I first began to earn money and I have so many hundred dollars in the bank." That young man can get any reasonable credit at once.

That economy and thrift that he had practiced during his boyhood life was now, when he found an opportunity to get into business, a valuable asset and worth much more to him than the number of dollars it represented.

"This is the Life" is coming here with a typical Halton Powell cast and production, which wears a tasteful scenic setting and costume display and a cast that can act as well as sing. In fact, "This is the Life" cast has to act for the musical farce has a consistent bubbling plot and the music can be sung only by those who have natural singing voices and have trained them long and carefully. The ladies have not been forgotten in "This is the Life" for the latest Parsian fancies have been imported for the chorus. They are startling in design and daring in their color combinations and are to be the style a year hence the modistes prophesy.

CHANGED HIS MIND.

Baltimore, Md. When the sweet strains of the song, "Mother," played by a street piano, wafted through windows kept wide open because of the balmy, spring-like weather of the last few days, a Cumberland, Md., recruit for the United States marine corps burst into tears and left the recruiting station of the "sea soldiers" in the Custom House Building today. The recruit had not yet been enlisted and the recruiting officers made no effort to prevent his leaving.

"The sound of a bursting shell in battle might have conveyed the same sort of idea to that young fellow, and it is perhaps just as well," remarked one of the recruiting sergeants when the recruit, motherward bound, left the office.
