Washington, May 31.—(Special Correspondence.)—It is every day more evident to political observers that there is a wide difference between the democratic party and the democratic leaders. The party is made up of individuals in all states who have high ideals and who are devoted to the welfare of the whole country. The democratic leadership is drawn almost entirely from the South, and its principles are subordinated to local interests and temporary partisan advantage. The party has desired economy, efficiency, observance of the merit system in the government service, and fulfillment of platform pledges. The leadership has been willing to disregard campaign promises, to throw the government service into the old, discarded spoils system, and has been willing to appropriate public funds for any old purpose, just so it helped a democratic district. It is apparent that there are enough independent voters in the membership of the democratic party to rebuke the leaders at the polls in November.

When the democrats were putting through their $50,000,000 appropriation for flood control of the lower reaches of the Mississippi river, Congressman Maden, of Illinois, offered some suggestion that made a very favorable impression upon both republican and democratic members. He asserted that the place to control a flood is not on the lower part of a river, but in the upper portions and the tributaries, where the water should be confined for power purposes, and let out into the stream gradually, thus serving the triple purpose of furnishing power, preventing floods in spring, and keeping the rivers supplied with water in the dry season. But the appropriation for the lower river went through.

Senator Norris, of Nebraska, a progressive, but in the ranks of the republican party, gave an amusing account of the democratic record on the Panama tolls question, a few days ago. He recalled the fact that ever since the question first came up he advocated charging American ships the same tolls as ships of other nations. Democratic editors denounced him as a "railroad senator" and pointed to President Wilson's campaign speech advocating free tolls. When Wilson changed his attitude on the question, the democratic members changed their votes, the democratic editors became advocates of the very policy Norris had been pursuing, but they failed to commend him.

Congressman Albert Johnson, of Washington, created quite a sensation in the house a few days ago by asserting that he had seen an order issued by the secretary of war calling for the discharge from certain crews of all persons not native-born citizens of the United States. This order, said Johnson, had already resulted in the dismissal of five men who are natives of Scandinavian countries but for many years naturalized citizens of the United States. Mr. Johnson asserted that the loyalty of these men cannot be questioned and he depreciated such an order at a time when this country is not at war with any nation and on friendly terms with the nations of which these men were formerly citizens.

Congressman Sloan, of Nebraska, never loses an opportunity to remind the democrats of the manner in which they legislated to the injury of the farmers. Speaking a few days ago on the shipping bill, he cited figures to show that after the enactment of the Underwood tariff bill we imported 30,000,000 bushels of corn and 400,000,000 pounds of beef, most of it from Argentina, where land values are only half those in the United States, and labor costs only half as much. He asserted the freight rates from Argentina to the United States are less than half the rate from Nebraska to the Atlantic seaboard. Government owned ships, he feared, would further injure our American farmers by carrying other Argentine products to our markets at low rates.

The president went to the circus when the big show came to Washington the other day. We hope he enjoyed it. But, as a matter of fact, he can enjoy the antics of a clown any time that he chooses to take a peep into the navy department.

In some quarters there appears a disposition to renew the debate over the question, Who caused the republican division of four years ago? That question is of no present political importance. The democrats would like to retain it as an issue, but like most issues which democrats show a fondness for, it belongs to the limbo of days that are past. The republican party is looking forward, not backward, this year.

The Price, As Slim As The Suit

TO look at Adler's Collegian Clothes, you might think they are a little outside of your purse-range—but "appearances are deceitful." Just you take a look at their price-tag and you'll see that they are within your reach.

You were probably puzzled because there's more style, fabric and workmanship-value crowded into every suit or overcoat of

than into others at the price. It's a logical mistake.
