A CREDITABLE CAMPAIGN.

The republican party and its leaders have good reason to be proud of the character of campaign that was conducted prior to the recent election. It was a campaign conducted in accordance with the highest political standards. It was a campaign of which no member of the party has any reason to be ashamed.

While there was considerable discussion of the personal characteristics of Woodrow Wilson, this was made necessary by the fact that his personality has figured very materially in the shapping of national politics. He has been recognized by the other nations of the earth as the representative of public opinion in the United States. His vacillating characteristics, his declaration that we are a nation "too proud to fight," his general willingness to surrender rather than persist, became necessary issues in the contest, because it was up to the American people to determine whether they desire these new features continued in the expression of our national character. Discussion of the extravagance, the broken pledges, and the lack of efficiency of the present administration related more or less to the personality of President Wilson, but could scarcely be included in the category of personal issues.

The more important subjects for discussion by republicans were the fundamental issue of the tariff, the tendency toward government ownership and the willingness of congress as well as the president to surrender to the coercive demands of a small body of citizens who demanded that congress should by legislative enactment require a quasi public corporation to increase their wages.

This was an educational campaign in much the same sense as the campaign of 1896 when McKinley ran against Bryan. Bryan had not served the nation in the presidency. He had, therefore, no official record which called for discussion. Nothing then was known of the character of stamp which his personality would place upon the nation. Aside from this difference, the recent campaign has been of a highly educational character, as was the campaign of 1896.

UNITED WE STAND.

One reassuring feature of American politics is the readiness with which the American people lay aside their party feeling on the day after election and rally to the support of the man who wins.

This is a government by majorities, or, sometimes, by pluralities. Every man who maintains citizenship under the American constitution expressly agrees that although he will still maintain and assert his own individual opinions upon public questions, yet, when a ballot has been taken and the will of the majority has been determined, he and all those who agree with him will submit, if they are on the losing side. We have had but one illustration of the failure of the minority to submit to the will of the majority. It took four years of civil war to settle once for all the principle that when an election has been held, the will of the majority shall be absolutely permitted to prevail.

Nearly one-half of the American people are dissatisfied with the result of the election held on November 7th. It is a certainty that those who were on the losing side will rally to their old standards four years hence and try to secure the adoption, in our national government of all those principles and policies in which they believe.

Persons unfamiliar with our political system might look with some alarm upon the condition which would exist after the election had been held. Not so with those who are familiar with our political history. We shall all join in an effort to accomplish the largest possible good for the largest number of people in our country. We shall still have our differences as to the wisest means to be pursued in the accomplishment of desired ends, but the majority will be permitted to carry out its will. Administrations may change or not change, but the government at Washington still lives.

Near the close of the recent campaign it became apparent that prices of the necessities of life had risen much faster than wages paid to labor have advanced, but the burden upon the consumer did not become great enough a sufficient length of time before election to influence many votes. The cost of living did not figure much in the campaign, notwithstanding it was a much more serious problem to the people of the country than it was in 1912, when it was one of the most effective subjects for democratic campaign speakers.

Of all their multitude of broken promises, the democratic leaders to suffer least from their failure to keep the promise to reduce the cost of living. They succeeded in making many people believe that they were entitled to credit for the prosperity which the war brought, but escaped censure for the increase in prices to the consumer. The fact is that the cost of living advanced under the democratic tariff law, even before the war begun, while wages and employment grew less. The democrats denied responsibility for either. Then when the war revived industry in many lines, the pointed to the dinner pails that "Wilson had filled" but charged the high cost of living against the war, and, in most cases, they "got away with it."

There is every reason to expect a continuance of the high prices for beef for several years to come. One of the largest packing houses in the country has contracts that run until the close of the war, for furnishing beef to the allied armies. With the end of the war far away, and with the herds on the ranges growing smaller, there is every encouragement for the man who is engaged in raising beef cattle. The company referred to has a steady market so large that it is installing cold storage plants on 60 ships for the beef carrying trade, and is extending its operations to Brazil. The war has been a great boon to the producer of beef, though the American consumer has to bear his share of the extra burden incident to high prices.

A strong plurality for the General

If the vote tomorrow were to be cast for most popular roofing, instead of for the election of national officials, there would be an overwhelming plurality in favor of CERTAIN-TEED Roofing.

This is indicated by the fact that "The General" makes 1/2 of all the asphalt roll roofing made in America. The balance is "scattered" among 39 other manufacturers.

Each year CERTAIN-TEED rolls up a strikingly increasing number of advocates, because this type of roof is coming to be recognized as the most efficient covering for all kinds of buildings, with either flat or pitched roofs.

Certain-teed Roofing is clean and sanitary, costs less to buy, less to lay, less to maintain and less per year of life. It is guaranteed for 5, 10 or 15 years, according to ply (1, 2 or 3). It actually lasts longer.

The secret of this long life lies in the quality of the roofing felt, and the asphalt saturation. Roofings do not wear out—their life depends upon the length of time they retain the saturation. CERTAIN-TEED is made of the best quality of roofing felt, and is thoroughly saturated with the General's own blend of soft asphalt, which keeps the inner saturation soft and prevents the drying-out process so destructive to the ordinary roofing.

CERTAIN-TEED is made in rolls; also in slate-surfaced shingles. There is a type of CERTAIN-TEED for every kind of building, with flat or pitched roofs, from the largest sky-scraper to the smallest residence or out-building.

CERTAIN-TEED is sold by responsible dealers all over the world, at reasonable prices. Investigate it before you decide on any type of roof.
