We see by last week's Broken Bow Republican that Geo. E. Benschoter, from whom we purchased the Northwestern some ten years ago, and wao went from here up to the sand hills, and a few months ago moved to Broken Bow, has become editor and publisher of the Republican. George was raised from boyhood to manhood in Loup City and Sherman county, and is too well known by our people to need comment at our hands. He is a hustler and we opine will move the Republican rapidly to the forefront mong the newspapers of this section.

Remember the American Concert Four at the Opera House, Loup City, Oct. 14th.

Do you remember those good old days when the colored people would hold old fashloned camp meeting in the grove, and how the white folks would gather around to hear the genuine plantation melodies sung only as the 'DARKY' can sing them. The famous Nashville students will bring back those good old days and take you way down south. Their fantastic dances done as the negro alone can do them. Their quaint but tuneful songs their plantation songs, acts and their mimicry will be done exactly as the negro does them and all that means two solid hours of wholesome and invigorating amusement. The Nash-ville Students will positively be here on Saturday, October 11, at the Opera House, Prof Mose Walker's Colored Band will give a concert on the main street, this company comes highly re-commended, a large crowd will be present. It has been three years since City and at that time drew the largest crowd of the season. Admission will be 25, 35 and 50 cents, reserved seats are on sale at the usual place at

CHAPTER IX.

Dunham slept very little that night. His soul was hovering between joy and anxiety. Almost he was inclined to find some way to send her word about the man he had seen lingering about the place, and yet perhaps it was foolish. He had doubtless been to call on the cook, and there might be no connection whatever between what Dunham had heard and seen and the lonely girl.

Next day, with careful hands, the girl made herself neat and trim with a few materials she had at hand. She gathered her little hoard of money to take with her, and cast one look back over the cheerless room, with a great longing to bid it farewell forever, and go back to the world where she belonged; yet she realized that it was a quiet refuge for her from the world that she must hereafter face. Then she closed her door, went down the stairs and out into the street, like any other servant on her afternoon out, walking away to meet whatever crisis might arise. She had not dared to speculate much about the subject of the coming interview. It was likely he wanted to inquire about her comfort, and perhaps offer material aid She would not accept it, of course, but it would be a comfort to know that some one cared. She longed inexpressibly for this interview, just because he had been kind, and because he belonged to that world from which she had come. He would keep her secret. He had true eyes. She did not notice soft, padded feet that came wobbling down the street after her. and she only drew a little further out toward the curbing when a blear-eyed, red face peered into hers as she stood waiting for the car. She did not notice the shabby man who boarded the car after she was seated.

Tryon Dunham stood in the great stone doorway, watching keenly the passing throng. He saw the girl at once as she got out of the car, but he he did not notice the man in the baggy coat, who lumbered after her and watched with wondering scrutiny as Dunham came forward, lifted his hat, and took her hand respectfully. Here was an element he did not understand. He stood staring, puzzled, as they disappeared into the great building; then he planted himself in a convenient place to watch until his charge should come out again. This was perhaps a gentleman who had come to engage her to work for him. She might be thinking of changing her place. He must be on the alert.

Dunham placed two chairs in the far corner of the inner parlor, where they were practically alone, save for an occasional passer through the hall. He put the girl into the most comfortable one, and then went to draw down the shade, to shut a sharp ray of afternoon sunlight from her eyes. She sat there and looked down upon her shabby shoes, her cheap gloves, her coarse garments, and honored him for the honor he was giving her in this attire. She had learned by sharp experience that such respect to one in her station was not common. As he came back, he stood a moment looking down upon her. She saw his eye rest with recognition upon the hat she wore, and her pale cheeks

"I den't know what you will think of my keeping this," she said shyly, putting her hand to the hat, "but it seemed really necessary at the time, and I haven't dared spend the money for a new one yet. I thought perhaps you would forgive me and let me pay you for it some time later."

"Don't speak of it," he broke it, in a low voice. "I am so giad you could use it at all. It would have been a comfort to me if I had known where it was. I had not even missed it, be cause at this time of year I have very little use for it. It is my traveling

He looked at her again as though the sight of her was good to him, and his gaze made her quite forget the words she had planned to say. "I am so glad I have found you!"

ne went on. "You have not been out of my thoughts since I left you that night on the train. I have blamed myself over and over again for having gone then. I should have found some way to stand by you. I have not had one easy moment since I saw you last."

His tone was so intense that she ould not interrupt him; she could only sit and listen in wonder, hal rembling, to the low-spoken torren of feeling that he expressed. She tried to protest, but the look in his face topped her. He went on with an arnestness that would not be turned side from its purpose.
"I came to Chicago that I might search for you. I could not stand the aspense any longer. I have been lookag for you in every way I could think of, without openly searching, for that dared not do lest I might jeopardize our safety. I was almost in despair then I went to dine with Mr. Phillips ast evening. I felt I could not go one without knowing at least that ou were safe, and now that I have ound you, I cannot leave you until know at least that you have no urther need for help."

She summoned her courage now, and poke in a voice full of feeling. "On, you must not feel that way.
ou helped me just when I did not know what to do, and put me in the way of helping myself. I shall never cease to thank you for your kindness cease to thank you for your kindness to an utter stranger. And now I am doing very well." She tried to smile, but the tears came unbidden instead. "You poor chold!" His tone was full of something deeper than compassion, and his even spoke volumes. "To you suppose I think you are doing well when I see ... wearing the garb (To be Cratinum)
