Loup City was visited by a so-called theatrical aggregation last week, producing the old play, "Ten Nights in a Bar Room." The opera house was crowded and the acting, if so it may be called, was execrable, the characters, with but one or two exceptions being amateurish to a most marked degree, and the lines being stalked through with the monotone, precision and awkwardness of the school boy in his first dialogue. The exceptions mentioned were the soubrette character of Melibthie Cartwright and a portion of the work of Sample Switche. It is too bad we are not treated to better companies than seem to be the lot of our people.

Providence is sometimes especially kind, even to a barber, so Robbins says. A few nights since, when the heavens were opened and rain barrels bountifully replenished, he who "pays the bills" was removing his rude appendages with his usual dexterity, smiling anon as his customers departed in the storm remembering he was amply provided with a rain coat to protect himself in any such emergency. But he never dreamed of the hidden chuckle that concealed itself behind the placid features of a customer who did not trouble himself over the usual quandary of the evening nor appear to be worried at results, being used to figuring out problems with himself in the credit column. No matter how hard the credit column, the Masonic artist never lost, so when the evening was far spent and it was time for the Robbins to nest again, it was no strange nor startling mystery that confronted him on beholding, or rather not beholding the article within the folds of which he of the brush and muzz had expected to complete the "Hal ha" of the evening over his departed guests. The "Hal ha" had gone with the coat. However, the rain had ceased.
