ATHLETE NOT WIDELY ENVIED, TEST SHOWS

Unusual Results Disclosed By Survey Conducted At Syracuse.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.—The star college athlete who basks in the glare of publicity and public admiration throughout his college career but who makes barely passing grades in his studies is not so widely envied by his fellow students as is popularly supposed.

Of 3,515 Syracuse university students who participated in an extensive survey conducted by Dr. Floyd H. Allport, Syracuse social psychologist, and Dr. Daniel Katz of Princeton university, less than 2 percent indicated that they would rather be the foremost athlete with low grades. In fact, only fifty-five students, or 1.6 percent of the entire group, would assume that vaunted position at the expense of their studies.

Gets His Share. The athlete, however, comes in for his share of admiration on the campus, even if few would exchange places with him. Seven hundred and one students or 20.2 percent indicated that they admired the best athletes more than any other group.

The most industrious student gained the respect and admiration of the majority of his fellows. Sixty-five percent, or 2,261 men and women said that they most admired this type of individual. Forty-five percent, or 1,567 students, admitted the undergraduates most active in campus activities, they declared.

Sophisticated Student "Out." The most sophisticated or worldly wise students received the admiration of the smallest number of their fellows. Only 8.5 percent of the entire group admitted admiring this type. Other student-types most admired were: Popular students, 27.7 or 28.1 percent. Most brilliant students, 22.4 or 22.7 percent.

"That the best athletes on the campus are most revered as models by one-fifth of Syracuse students may suggest a tendency toward the more intellectual values of college life," the psychologists admitted, "or perhaps that we have evoked here the public rather than the private attitudes of the students. On the other hand, it may be that athletic prowess, being unattainable for the great majority, is less admired by students than industry and extra-curricular success, which lie more nearly within the realm of possibility for all. In other words, an individual's admiration is often a form of self-identification. He respects those qualities in people with which he can in some way link himself."

Conclusions Vary. When asked the student-type preferred as personal models, the undergraduates presented quite a different set of conclusions. Fourteen hundred and forty-three, or 41.6 percent, indicated that they would prefer to be poor scholars with record for all around activity in college life. Other preferences indicated in this section of the survey were: Mediocre tho industrious student, 8.3 or 24.8 percent. Intelligent student with low grades because of outside intellectual interests, 5.5 or 16 percent. Poor scholar but popular student, 1.1 or 3.2 percent. Foremost athlete with low grades, 5.5 or 1.6 percent.

Subordinate Intellectual Ability. "Perhaps the most significant disclosure from this portion of the study is the subordinate value which the students placed upon intellectual ability and scholarship in comparison with the more popular interests of social life upon the campus," say the authors of the survey. "The view held by professors and administrators concerning what it means to 'go to college' is so widely different from that held by those who are actually going that it seems to belong to a different world."

ACT I

(Reading time: Too long)

Scene: The beautiful Nebraska campus. Time: Quart of milk.

Props necessary to put on your own play: First, a rose in the rear room of the building on right. The building is better known as Farmasea Hall. (Note: The rose does not apply to any occupants of the building.) Second, lost bearings, books, pet cats, appetites, girl, paradise, in fact anything that has been lost and unreturned for which you would sacrifice some of your pride or money to get back. This scene is boring as it is so common but Herb Yenne is still playing in that kind so we do not feel that by bringing this up we commit as bad an error as belching. The college lad who is shown on the right is dressed in regular sloppy fraternity fashion. His face is long, his beard fuzzy. His mother lives with his father and it is believed he is their son. Now go on with the story.

ACT II

Another scene, another farce. Second man in picture doesn't have halitosis so far as Ibsen could determine. He did have information on the Rag's Lost and Found Department. He is telling the poor little ragged college man where he can best find his lost or strayed articles. Keep on if you can, it won't be long now, only one more scene. Watch for the entrance of the Kosmet Klub roots on the right. They are never on the right by rights.

ACT III

Last and most boring scene. Boring noise off stage made by listening to a Bizad prof, by large mosquito or by carpenter. The star performer in this atrocity took the advice of his friend of the people, by the peoples, for the peoples and went to the Daily Nebraskan office and put in a Classified Ad for two days and actually found his missing junk. This little story is ended but the memory lingers on like morning mouth on Sunday.
