On last Friday evening, instead of their usual program, the Delian society held a very pleasant social at the rooms of the Misses Bruner, Dempster, O'Sullivan and Pillsbury.

Several students, aided by Regent H. D. Estabrook, had a dispute late Saturday evening with a noble member of Lincoln's police force as to the students' right to yell. An over officious guardian of the law, told a crowd of students that he would arrest them if they didn't stop yelling. Of course they didn't stop. The policeman rang for the patrol. Then Mr. Estabrook stepped up and laid down a little law for the policeman's benefit. He said that students had a right, existing from the time when the first university was founded, to yell when, where, and as much as they pleased. He also said that if the Lincoln chief of police gave any orders which interfered with this right he ought to decorate a grave yard. He also told the boys to yell again, which needless to say, they did. The policeman then departed.
