The Expansion of Europe.

Dean H. P. Judson of Chicago University lectured in the chapel, Tuesday evening. University and high school people formed the greater part of the audience. Several members of the university faculty were among the dean's hearers.

The speaker thought the spread of European civilization in the last five centuries was marvelous. He urged that the great motive for all this was the love of money, or in one word commerce.

Da Gama sailing around the Cape of Good Hope in 1499, and thus opening Oriental trade to Europe, was declared the first epoch in the spread of European civilization. The second epoch brought the palmy days of Spain and Portugal, a flood of precious metals came upon Spain and it proved her ruin. Portuguese trade ultimately killed that with Turkey and Egypt, from Italy. England and Holland profited by this commercial revolution.

The planting of colonies occupied the greater part of the seventeenth century. During this century of national rivalry Holland became the first commercial nation of Europe. England began eastern commerce about this time, and during the eighteenth century proved a commercial power.

During the last era, transportation has effected marvels. Australia and Canton are as near London to-day as Venice was in Columbus' time.

Dean Judson's lecture on "The Territorial Expansion of Europe" is a comprehensive summary of the movements of exploring, conquering and colonizing nations in the last 500 years. The lecturer evinced not merely the possession of a number of facts but a clear conception of the principles underlying nation-movements.
