

truth. The doctrine which to Shakespeare was distant vague, unutterable is here presented with a dramatic vividness to the readers mind. Materialism with its heavier sciences and other adjuncts is a hollow fantasm—a floating film on the great ocean of truth. The universe itself is but a vesture of the unknowable, eternal. He has heard the song of the Earth Spirit in Goethe's Faust—

"Thus at the roaring loom of Time I ply
And weave for God the garment thou doest see him by.

Action is to him the magic wand that unfolds the mysteries of being. Work is worship; and the temple of labor is this world of ours with its dome reaching to the heaven of heavens. What he says of his fictitious "professor" is especially applicable to himself.—"His attitude is that of a man who said to Cant, 'Begone;' and to Truth, 'Be thou in place of all to me.' A man who had manfully defied the Time's Prince as devil to his face; nay, perhaps Hannibal-like was mysteriously consecrated from birth to that warfare, and now stood minded to wage the same by all weapons, in all places, at all times. In such a cause any soldier, were he but Polack Scytheman shall be welcome.
