

any very good grace. If the students had to be driven out of the room at 8:30 we think the janitor might have left one jet burning until they could find their wraps and reach the door.

The Palladian girls scratched the slate and invited the boys to society last week, but that was not all. After the program seven of the boys were led up to a large sleigh and told to get in. Their ladies attended them, and merrily they sleighed for over an hour. The other willing victims were led unexpectedly to the residence of Miss Moore, where they played games, chewed gum, ate refreshments and enjoyed themselves generally.

In some previous issues of the HESPERIAN the local editor has shirked some of his duties and they have consequently fallen upon other members of the board, but this time it is different. The "comps" got him down here and wouldn't let him out till he wrote a column and a half of solid (?) matter. But that makes no difference now for this is the last issue for which he will have to turnish copy. He takes this occasion to bid farewell to all his enemies.

Mrs. Cleveland's dressmaker is a man. We have in our midst a young man who recently manufactured a number of doll's bonnets. The feminine portion of an infant class of a certain Sunday school are so delighted with his work that they are continually besieging him to make more, and as a result Mr. G. contemplates serving an apprenticeship in a milliner store next summer. We rejoice to see the different fields of employment open so rapidly to the young men.

The worst joke of the season was played on Mr. H— last Friday night. In common with the rest of the Palladian boys he received and accepted a young lady's invitation for society. On Friday evening he went for his lady and found her with all her wraps on ready to go. They started for the Palladian hall. The young lady's voice was unnatural, she had a very bad cold; but Mr. H— thought it was the strangest kind of hoarseness he had ever known. Other things besides the voice seemed strange. Just as they reached the Palladian doors a new idea struck Mr. H—. He viewed the matter from a hypothetical standpoint and the truth flashed upon him, but it was too late. They were seated. The young lady (?) removed her veil and displayed the masculine features of Mr. B—. Thanks to the ushers, the young lady that Mr. H— thought he had, sat just across the aisle from him; but that was too near for Mr. H—. He seemed lost in meditation during the program and as soon as it was over he sneaked away and left his partner to go home alone without even asking to be excused.

THE HESPERIAN ASSOCIATION met last Wednesday in response to the call. The meeting was called to order by Codding, and T. S. Allen was elected secretary pro tem. C. S. Lobingier offered an amendment to the constitution which was in substance as follows: That the board of editors consist of six members to be elected in January and to serve for one year. They shall elect from their number an editor-in-chief, who shall be ex-officio member of the board and in case of a tie shall have two votes. The amendment was adopted and six editors were elected in accordance with it, all to be ratified at a subsequent meeting. The editors elect are O. W. Fifer, H. C. Peterson, T. S. Allen, C. F. Ansley, W. W. Robertson and G. W. Gerwig. A. A. Reed was elected secretary, and Geo. H. Tinker, treasurer. The meeting was adjourned for one week. At a meeting of the board Ansley was elected editor-in-chief.
