ALL LIFE OWES ORIGIN TO BAC-TERIA OR MICROBE.

That Breeding is Secondary to Good Feeding.

Probably the most novel address given before the American Breeders' Ass'n in connection with the National Corn show was delivered by Q. I. Simpson, member of the committee on theoretical research in heredity. The speaker contends that all life owes its origin to bacteria and he offered a highly technical and scientific paper to back up his statements.

"If you would have a big, broad steer you must see that he is well fed from his youtn," said Dean Waters, speaking on "The Influence of Nutrition on Animal Type, or the Effect of Feeding on the Types of Animals."

"Students have always approved of the stand that heredity plays the most important part in shaping cattle and have endeavored to accept the theory that feed and environments were secondary to heredity. I will try to leave the balance to account for by

"With reference to the principles involved in their improvement by selection and breeding, we may divide animals into three general classes," said Prof. W. J. Spillman of the United Prof. W. J States Department of Agriculture, in speaking on "Application of the Principles of Heredity to the Improvement of Plants and Animals."

"The third class includes those organisms in which cross fertilization normally occurs. It includes all the higher animals. Amongst plants there are some species in which cross pollenation is necessary to seed production, but generally speaking most plants in this class are what we describe as open pollenated.

"One very interesting deduction from the law of recombination is this: that when a horned animal crops out in a polled breed, or a red animal occurs in a black breed, both of the parents of such an animal are impure with reference to the character which | Weekly. crops out. A few horned calves are born in all polled breeds, which simply means that there are some individuals in the breed, which are not pure bred with reference to horns. Likewise, a few red calves occur in all black breeds of cattle which show that some individuals of the breed are not pure bred with preference to black

By taking advantage of the law of recombination it is possible to produce almost an indefinite number of new breeds, breeding as true to type as our present breeds."
