The most unique entertainments given in this city in a long time were Mr. and Mrs. W. B. Ogden's "faggot" parties Tuesday and Wednesday evenings. On these occasions the beautiful and cozy home of the Ogdens' was rendered additionally attractive by the air of oriental luxury that characterized the arrangements. Candle light, subdued enough to lend a witching affect, was substituted for gas, and the uncertain glow from the faggots, piled on from time to time contributed to the general wierd ensemble. All chairs were removed from the reception rooms, and their places were taken by divans and couches skirting all sides of the rooms. These were supplied with innumerable cushions, the whole making an irresistible combination of comfort and ease. There was in keeping with the surroundings, an oriental freedom as to the usual conventions. Pipes, cigars and cigarettes were freely offered to the gentlemen, privileges that were quite freely taken advantage of, and at appropriate intervals punch was served. The feature of the entertainments was that each guest was called upon to relate a story, the narrator being entitled to one faggot, placed in the embers for his especial benefit. All kinds of stories were told and much amusement was afforded by this ingenious feature. On Tuesday evening Mrs. A. S. Raymond won the prize, a volume of the Prince of India, for an original poem, having for its subject the faggot party. Wednesday evening, at the second faggot party, the prize, a handsome edition of "Trilby," was won by W. Morton Smith.
