IN SOCIETY.

There has lately been a discussion of church weddings in the columns of the daily newspaper press of this city, in which it was contended, on one side, that the church for the time being is really an enlarged home of the bride, and as such should be safe from intrusion on the part of the unbidden public; and on the other side, that the church is at all times the altar of God, and as such 's, or should be, open to every body at all times.

One is hardly disposed to accept wholly, either of these propositions. If it is absurd to contend that the House of God, on the occasion of a wedding, is nothing more than an enlarged house of the bride, the other proposition is almost as untenable. Without going into the ecclesiastical law it may be said that the church is a temple for the worship of God, and for the performance of such rites and observances as are sanctioned or prescribed by the church. The sealing of the marriage contract is one of the rites so prescribed, and if one follows the ideas of the church, it is most fitting that the wedding should be celebrated in the house of God. The marriage ceremony is as serious and important as any church rite, and it is entitled to all proper safeguards against interruption and disturbance.

At confirmation it is true the public is admitted. In case of such a crush, however, as was apparent at one or two of the church weddings last winter, the authorities would certainly take every precaution to preserve order, and if the people became unruly they would be justified in closing the doors. And the church wedding should receive the same protection. Cards are issued, not because the bride considers the church as her own home, but to prevent an influx of people that would overtax the accommodations and interfere with the ceremony. Probably the wedding should be open to all as long as order is maintained; but there is no reason why an unruly crowd should be admitted mar one of the most impressive of the church's observances. It is the universal custom in all large cities to issue cards as a wise precaution, and there can be no valid objection to such a course. In fact recent experience in this city seems to make it absolutely necessary if the wedding ceremony is not to be turned into a ridiculous show.
