An Impression of the Legislature.

The members of the house were excited. Some stood up, some sat down, some walked back and forth, but all were talking as if their very life depended on their being heard above the rabble. An impressive summons from the speaker and all was quiet in the large room. Even the people in the galleries instructively obeyed the summons and listened intently, for once forgetting to talk.

The silence was restful.

One man rose to his feet.

He wore a large checked suit that looked as if it had been hung out in a rain storm. The cotton threads had shrunk and on first glance it looked as if the suit had been made of seersucker. The sleeves were about three inches too short. On his head a crop of sorrel hair mixed with gray. The sides of his face were covered with the same briar-bush, only a shade darker.

When a boy he seldom used a comb and when he grew older and felt the need of smoothing out his locks, they had proved refractory and would not obey the touch of the comb and the will of the owner.

All eyes were turned on the legislator. After rolling a cud around in his mouth and lodging it under his tongue he said: "I don't see any use of making such a racket over a little thing. County aint got no interest in that bill any how."

Everything has been nicely arranged for the comfort and ease of the people who sit in the chairs and "look as wise as owls" and make the laws that shall govern the people of the state. Nicely polished chairs with good high backs, I believe, much to the chagrin of the occupants, the cushions were forgotten. Footstools, cushioned ones of course, would have been very nice things to have had but the back or arm of a chair can be used as a substitute. Cuspidors are placed just the right distance from the legislator's chair. It is needless to say they, the cuspidors, are used incessantly—sometimes they are hit, sometimes they are not.

DORA BACHELLER.

"What will you do if she refuses you?"

"Save money."

He—Will you write to me while I am away.

She—Yes, if you will stay away long enough.

"A man can't get along in this world without brains."

"Do you mind telling me the secret of your success?"
