SHORT STORIES.

A package came weft from Indiana where Grandmother lived when she was a little girl. The family were surprised that it should be addressed to Grandmother herself. Who could it be from? There was nobody in Indiana that they knew except Grandmother's sister. It must be from her.

But Grandmother was too nervous to have them all go up to her room and watch her while she opened the box. So they waited impatiently at the foot of the stairs and let Ethel carry the box up.

She opened the door eagerly and dumped her burden down in Grandmother's lap.

"It's come, for you, something," she urged breathlessly and brought the scissors while Grandmother's glasses were adjusted tremulously.

Ethel's brisk little fingers snipped the string and tore away the papers. Then she emptied out into Grandmother's lap a heap of delicate petals and leaves, Indiana wildflowers, packed tenderly in soft moss. She put out her hand eagerly over the flowers and felt something hot splash down on the top of her thumb. She looked up in dismay.

"Why Grandma! What is the matter?" she wailed, "don't you think they're pretty? I do."

He sits sharpening his knife. He is a young man and in most things he has a good idea of his own immaturity. But when it comes to sharpening his knife he lets his self-complacency get the best of him. He goes so far as to say that nobody can sharpen a knife to suit his fastidious judgment.

He has three grades of whetstone. He picks up the first nonchalantly, gives a few careless strokes and picks up the second. How he bends himself to the task. He rubs slowly and cautiously. He lifts the knife to feel the edge. A dreamy look comes into his eyes as if entire absence of mind were necessary to any scientific determination as to the fineness of a knife edge. He gives a long stroke and takes up the finest stone. Now for the real artistic part of the work. With infinite care he grinds off an infinitesimal imperfection. He stops to wipe off his forehead and the tips of his fingers. He feels the smooth stone with the end of his thumb. He smooths out his trousers and places the stone more firmly on his knee. A slow stroke, a short squint and a deep breath! Then I know that his work is done.

If there is such a thing as an amateur connoisseur in knife edges, he is one.

She is a cross girl. I never thought so till today. I was going through the library where the clock hangs and saw her standing quite still looking up at it. I wondered why she should look so earnestly at the clock. Then I remembered, it had been stopped yesterday. The girl finally turned towards me. I had an idiotic impulse to be pleasant, though I noticed that she seemed pre-occupied. I hesitated just a moment and spoke in a careless sprightly fashion: "Is the clock still stopped?" She looked at me in a stupefied way. Then she said icily: "I think not. I know of no reason why it should be."

I believe she thought I had gone daft. I wish now that I had taken time to explain all the reasons why I thought the clock might have stopped.

ANNIE PREY.

Cynnicus—It's a good thing the new tariff bill doesn't levy a tax on immigrants.

Finnicus—Why so? "The expenditures for our city police service are quite high enough as it is."

"You can run a typewriter, can't you?" "Well, I thought I could until I got her."

Pointed shoes are not out—our main point is to suit the foot and we feel sure the foot and the eye will convince the customer that our judgment is good and even the pocketbook will not feel squeezed.
