erally on the same horizontal plane, are two circular cup-like depressions, covered with a fine membrane of a deep pink color, and encircled with a fringe or border—corrugations of an exceedingly delicate membrane. These organs are the rudimentary eye-ears, to be further described when treating of the more fully developed order.

"About two inches below the central eye is a small fissure, one and a half inches in length, and half an inch in breadth, through which liquid at intervals is ejected. This is the channel for the expired air. Beneath the locomotor organs the body extends about ten inches, terminating in a cushioned extremity, five inches in circumference. Upon this cushion the creature rests when in shallow water, which is its usual retreat.

When Jamieson thought it was time to be getting home again he said goodbye to the planet and its one-eyed inhabitants and returned to the Detroit telegraph office. Warmth returned to his body, the rigidity disappeared, and he became conscious of his earthly surroundings. Then he sat down and wrote all about his trip to the moon and to the planet Venus as here related.

These out-of-town trips continued until Jamieson was about 40 years old—in his second transition, as he describes. Then he must have remained away too long from his earthly tenement, for when he got back from Mars, or Jupiter, or some of the way stations—if he ever did come back—the people who didn't know about such things had put his body in a coffin and buried it.

The most interesting thing about Jamieson's case, and which it makes it really more interesting than that of the grocer's clerk, is the power of description he possesses. It is in perfect sequence and has none of the incoherence that one would expect to find in an unbalanced mind. Jamieson left a drawing of one of the inhabitants of Venus as he remembered it. Nothing like it was ever seen in the heavens above or the earth beneath. It looked like a two-legged, one-eyed, four-nosed human camel, with a reversed hump.

THE THEATRE,

Every seat and much of the standing room was occupied at the Grand last evening by an audience that turned out to witness the second performance given by Kirke's Comedy Co. The play of the evening was the amusing farce comedy—An Arabian Night, and it was handled in a very creditable manner. Mr. J. Francis Kirke, the leading man is a finished and painstaking actor, and has surrounded himself with a company of competent players. Mr. Kirke will be remembered in Sioux Falls, as the late leading man of the Woodward Theatre Co. As an additional attraction Mr. Kirke has secured the great H round fight, in counterparts of Corbett and Fitzsimmons—and those who witnessed the pictures last night imagined themselves by the ring side, so true to life did the pictures seem. Tonight they present another amusing comedy entitled Snow Ball.—Sioux Falls Argus. Prices 10-20 and 30. Seats now on sale at the Lansing Theatre box office. Remember the dates Monday and Tuesday, June 14th and 15th.
