Decidedly one of the most metropolitan of society events this season was the reception given by the Haydon Art club on Christmas night in the art hall of the state university. There seemed to be more sense of the fitness of things than is usually displayed on such occasions. Some were rather startled to see the men in their evening dress and the ladies in handsome reception gowns. Yet this was as it should be. It seemed rather strange because it was a change. It is a trivial thing in itself, yet it shows a marked tendency toward metropolitan democracy—a thing very noticeably absent from Lincoln society. The best is too often saved for a small clique. The general cordiality and interest displayed on this night is an improvement which might be studied to advantage.

- The Patriarchs gave the second party of the season on Wednesday evening in the new hall in the Brae block. The front room was canvassed for the occasion. Miss Willoughby's orchestra furnished the music. The guests were:
