The English are constantly sneering at the Americans who spend their good money in buying and maintaining country houses in England, and our own newspapers are not idle in criticism of the same subject, but I wish to submit an instance in English snobbishness that none of our own new rich could possibly surpass. In an advertisement of a bazaar to be held in Chillingham palace occur the following baits to the general public desirous of browsing on a mere aspect

HEART DISEASE

And nervous ailments are as curable as other diseases. I treat nothing else.

of aristocracy:

The Countess of Tankerville and Friends at the Stalls.

Visitors will see the Interior of the Castle.

Visitors will see the Historical Portraits.

Visitors will see the three great Landseer Pictures.

Visitors will see the Family Portraits.

Visitors will see Lady Tankerville's own Oil and Water Colour Sketches.

And yet the English accuse us of undue devotion to the shrine of peers and peeresses! I do not think that any American public was ever so evidently supposed to possess lickspittle plebianism as is the section of the British public appealed to by the advertisement from which I have quoted. Think of the joy of seeing the Countess of Tankerville in actual flesh and blood, to say nothing of the family portraits and other works of art and aristocracy! The mind reels in contemplation of so much delicious happiness. I think this episode—belonging, to be quite specific, to the month of August, 1898, and to the country of Northumberland—should be of much service in refuting the notion that only Americans fawn at the sight of ancient aristocracy.

When President McKinley returns to Washington he will remain but a few days when he will take another short vacation. While the president is away the executive mansion will undergo a thorough overhauling, and a coat of white paint will be administered to its exterior under the direction of Colonel Bingham, superintendent of public buildings and grounds. Not since the administration of President Harrison has the entire building received a full coat of paint, which it sadly needs. The White House has been painted so often that the paint peels off rapidly, and gives the building an unsightly appearance, which was not the case when its present incumbent first took up his residence there. During Major McKinley's trip to Cleveland and Montauk Point the attendants at the executive mansion gave it a thorough house cleaning.

A few days ago an Omaha woman went into McGeath's book store and inquired for "Lame as a Robin," being unable however, to tell the author. After much perplexity and delay, it was ascertained that she desired Victor Hugo's "Les Miserables."
