

Fashions of the Day.

My Dearest Adelaide: I really think I ought to write a letter for the press on "Shopping made easy," for I have discovered the greatest thing! I returned from my summer jaunt a wreck—a wreck physically tired—and warbrobe wrecked. Of course, you know that is my usual condition after a summer's outing. Well, I kept out of sight of the avenue, and sneaked down Sixth avenue to replenish a bit before I met anyone I knew. Somebody told me that "Altman" had the loveliest hats to be found in New York, and somehow, if your hat's all right—your hat and your shoes—you feel at least respectable. To make a long story short, I found these "loves" of hats, and before I came away I was rigged out for the fall season, and had not left the chair which I took before a duplex mirror, to try the effect of their exquisite head-coverings! Really, it was such a comfort. The third floor of the establishment was refitted, and the whole of it given up to convincing their patrons that shopping is a luxurious pleasure instead of a burden.

In the millinery and dressmaking department are spacious rooms. There are reception rooms, dressing rooms, order rooms, sample rooms, an "evening room," all furnished elegantly and in taste, that almost make one dissatisfied with home—the dissatisfaction coming in because here there is such attention paid to coloring and furnishings; the cool, greenish olives showing up dresses and hats and yourself in a way to prove how much this has to do with fine effect and personal beauty. As I sat there trying on those beautiful hats, and trying the effect of this material and that trimming against this summer-tanned face of mine—well, I was not bad.

The hats, Adelaide, all turn back from the face. They are decidedly picturesque, and of the sixteenth and seventeenth century styles—plumes and buckles, and rich velvets and brocades. One hat had a red velvet shirred crown with jet brim caught back at the side front with a cut steel buckle, and holding two fancy curled quills. Other hats with jet brims held ostrich tips, fastened with jet steel or rhinestone buckles. Shirred or corded velvet crowns in colors and jet brims seem to be a special feature of fall millinery. A dainty and stunning hat—if these two words can go together—was a crown of white duchess satin with soft folded brim of castor-color velvet, and steel buckle holding two fancy-curved quills of white and peacock shades.

Another hat had a jet crown with brim and standing loops of geranium red velvet—standing in all directions—caught in the center with daggers having pearl and rhinestone hilts. This geranium red is a new shade, brilliant yet softened into a pinkish light. It is the prettiest red we have had in a long time. It is prettier than the artillery red we have been wearing all summer, and that sounds almost like treason. You must know it is superb, though, or I would not say it; the artillery red and cavalry yellow still hold their own, but you know these two colors are so much more becoming to brunettes than to blondes. Geranium red can be worn by one as well as the other.

But to return to Altman's. My hats were a success, but then I discovered I had nothing to wear with them. My attendant suggested a suitable costume for one of them in the most modest manner, and then brought in some material to show me the effect. From one thing to another, before I was conscious of "shopping" or being troubled at all about decisions, I had ordered two street costumes and a theatre dress. For the theatre dress I did leave my chair and go into the "evening room," which is furnished in white and gold delicate, Frenchy style, and lighted brilliantly, to show "color seen by candle light."

In coming out of the spacious apartments—by way of parenthesis, Adelaide, you never saw such extravagance in the way of room. It struck me as something entirely out of commercial economy. I spoke of it. My attendant said: "Mr. Altman believes in comfort, and never thinks of economy from that point." On my way out of the dressmaking and millinery apartments—the appointments, the orders and the show rooms—the work is all done somewhere else—I found myself among some beautiful shoes and slippers. I halted again and stocked up. Think of that! Me, who never thought I could wear anything but shoes made by my old stand-by, "Ralph." I will never desert Ralph, but my summer shoes were actually a sight from sea and mountain climbing. These shoes of Altman's were as perfect in fit as those of my own shoemaker but, of course, I cannot tell as yet how they will wear.

But that was not all. In taking the elevator to go down my eyes lighted on some dreams of pillows. You know me, Adelaide! There's not much more room for pillows in my cosy nooks, but these pillows were too tempting. The consequence was I came away from my Sixth avenue "sneak" with all of my "nooks," as well as myself, newly draped—and, of course, my allowance all gone. I went over there thinking just to make myself presentable until I could do my usual Fifth avenue shopping. Altman, preparing for peace during the quiet business of war, captured my last dollar for the month, but he will get my next. I discovered something more than the elegant spacious rooms, and the perfect comfort, and the latest Parisian fashions; I found that my allowance had doubled. I actually bought some Sadik rugs out of my dress money! I could not do that in the avenue, eh, Adelaide? In my next letter I will give you a description of my dresses.
