Social and Personal

Dullness distinguishes the social situation, if popular opinion is to be taken as authority, and during the past week functions have been somewhat rarer than showers. Perhaps the undeniable frequency of the latter has something to do with the indisputable dearth of the former. However, social Lincoln is never wholly torpid, and life continues to assume kaleidoscopic aspects, even under such hampering conditions as steady downpours and unseasonable cold, though all insist that it is too late and too early to expect many social diversions.

This is the season of the "home returning." The past two or three weeks have brought many from the lakes, the seaside, the mountains, Europe, Canada and all sorts of delightful places, where the breezes in Lincoln were less cool than during the past week.

Through the kindness of Mrs. W. Q. Bell, we hear of the virtues of one spot, a favorite with Lincoln people, that lodge in the wilderness with the name suggestive of spicy zephyrs. Pine, Colorado, forty miles or so up the Platte canyon, a quaint little town (very little when the summer visitors have departed). Pine make an ideal spot for those who would find a retreat "in the heart of the hills."

Mrs. Bell, who returned some three weeks since and a party of friends are to be duly credited as mountain climbers of undaunted courage, they having made the ascent of Mt. Evans and returned to their camp at its foot in a single day. A splendid climb.

Those so happy as the summer with the "Lincoln colony" at Pine, declare the life to have been one continuous "picnic."

But the summer is over and gone. Already we have news from late sojourners that the snow has swept over the mountains, and breezes are frosty at Pine.
