Campbell and Mrs. Oakley; all of these were gowned in white. Mr. and Mrs. Wright's new home is the large brick residence which faces the south side of the capitol grounds. It has been remodeled throughout and is practically a new house. The exterior is attractive with its broad portico extending nearly around the edifice and the interior reflects the exquisite tas'e of its possessor. The hall, a rich blue, the carpets matching the walls. The parlor is done in delicate green and white and its furniture is in the old colonial style. The name of the oriental room suggests its furnishing, its coloring is rich, principally red, and there is a plentiful supply of couches and pillows. The broad stairway ascends from this room and from its spacious landing may be obtained a fine view of the room, an oriental fret work and rich draperies separating it only on either side the stair case. The library is an attractive room hung and dark green and terra cotts, with furniture of old English oak. The large dining room has hangings and rug of royal blue and silver and furniture of antique oak. A glance at the rooms on the second floor intensifies the dainty effect.
