state senator

If elected, I will endeavor to get the State Fair permanently located in Lincoln. I will oppose an appropriation to continue the Trans-Mississippi exposition next year in Omaha. I will devote my time to Lincoln's interests.

J. H. HARLEY.

London Letter.

Precautions against Anarchist attempts have been largely increased since the murder of the Empress. Even Lord Salisbury, who has been considered the most careless of men as regards personal prudence, is not so oblivious of safety as he appears. For obvious reasons, I forbear to describe the methods by which he is guarded in London; but when he roams about the beautifully lonely grounds at Hatfield, he has with him an enormous and powerful hound, which keeps close to his side. So efficacious a protector is this fine creature that the premier has named him "Pharaoh," because that ruler "would not let the people go." Lord Salisbury's jokes are always rather grim.

The guarding of the Rothschilds is, of course, a perfect system. If you call at New Court just at the close of business hours, you will find the alert detective absent from his post in the vestibule. Looking out, you will see him strolling in front of the building, with an absent and lazy air. Further on—if you are in the secret—you will notice four other men taking exercise. This means that the modest little brougham which is to fetch Lord Rothschild is just coming around the corner.

Sir Herbert Kitchener's handsome, fierce face looks from every shop window, and feminine hearts are pleasingly fluttered. I have just heard a good story about him. During the 1885 campaign, a boatload of English soldiers was proceeding up the Nile. The "Tom-mies" were navigating badly and hugging the left bank. They passed a particularly truculent Arab, propelling an irrigation-wheel. He shouted to them to keep to the other shore; but they—distrusting such advice, it may be—laughed and took no notice. Presently they ran aground and language was used. Then the Arab ran down the bank and remarked in forcible English: "There, you fools! I told you to keep away. Serves you right." The Arab was Major Kitchener, just returned from one of the little foraging expeditions into the enemy's country, which he always delights in taking.

If the country is enthusiastic about a hero in authority, I fear it is ungrateful to the average soldier. For instance, here is a typical case which occurred in London this week. Lieutenant Smith, of the Grenadier Guards, was struck off the voters' list at Chelsea, because he has been for four months absent from England. He is a Conservative; and the "objection" was lodged by the Radical agent and allowed by the revising barrister. Now the soldier was absent with his regiment serving in the Soudan! So
