

KATE CHASE'S WEDDING.

A Philadelphia artist, who was in Washington, recalls an incident of the marriage of the ill-fated Kate Chase to Governor Sprague, of Rhode Island.

"Everybody in the capital," he said, "was excited over the marriage."

"President Lincoln was very fond of her. Her sprightliness and good humor delighted the humorous philosopher."

"She was to have a magnificent wedding, and he, as chief executive, was to be the principal feature of the evening, after the bride and bridegroom."

"Mr. Lincoln was detained until half an hour before the wedding. Then he went rapidly to his room, found it locked and knocked."

"What do you want?" asked Mrs. Lincoln from inside.

"I want to get in," he answered, "are you nearly dressed? It is late."

"You can't come in," was the answer. "I'm sleeping."

"Aren't you going to the wedding?"

"Whose wedding?"

"Miss Chase's of course."

"O, so it is her wedding night. No, I am not going."

"Her tone was so decided that the President decided not to argue the subject, but begged that he be let in to dress himself."

"I won't be disturbed," she said. "It is not necessary for you to go to Kate Chase's wedding."

"Finally the President said: 'I will have the door unlocked.'"

"I will not let you in," she said, "but I'll throw you your clothes, and she threw his garments out into the hall, one by one, taking as long as possible."

"The President had to brush his hair and change his clothes in an adjoining room, belonging to his secretary, the door-keeper helping him as much as possible. Whether Mrs. Lincoln was jealous of Miss Chase no one ever knew. The affair might have arisen from her being of an eccentric turn of mind."—Philadelphia Press.
