

A Good Citizen.

The man who thinks, talks, writes and works to improve and build up the community where he lives, without regard to 'what people say, think or vote,' is a good citizen.

Too many men never do anything without first trying to find out whether the proposed action will be popular or unpopular. The almost universal weakness of the public men of the United States is debility of moral courage.

The good citizen will always endeavor to love his country for its own sake and not to stand by its flag because of the liberty and happy protection which that flag represents; but the demagogue talks glibly of country and flag, and the rights of the plain people for his own sake.

The demagogue is worse than war pestilence and famine unified.—The Conservative.

Chappie—She called me a conceited idiot.

Dolly—The idea! Why an idiot has nothing to be conceited about.

Dead men tell no tales. They don't have to. They leave widows who can do the talking.
