HARRIETT'S TEN CENTS WORTH

[BY MATHA PIERCE.]

It was nine o'clock of a keen winter night. We were walking until the car should come.

"I am ravenously hungry," said Harriett suddenly. "Let us take some marsh-mallows home and toast them."

"Absurd! We are too far down the street for marsh-mallows. Besides ravenous hunger cannot be—"

"Spare me!" said Harriett. "Both your arguments are sound. But I am determined to buy something."

"Peanuts," I suggested.

We neared a corner where a gas jet flamed above a screaming peanut roaster.

Harriett clutched my arm.

"The very thing!" she ejaculated.

"Peanuts?"

"No. Dates!"

She stopped at the oilcloth-covered counter, where a box of the glistening, rich, brown fruit tempted the unwary.

"Ten cents worth," I said to the small boy who slid down from his stool.

"Banan?" he said sleepily.

"Ten cents worth of dates," I said plainly. "I pointed besides."

Harriett sniffed.

"More than you will eat," I said.

The boy looked about for a paper bag, found it, and began to separate the dates from the mass, in little sticky lumps, using his pudgy, dirty fingers, as a wedge.

Harriett looked at him and gasped. She was too far gone to speak.

"You are too sleepy to sell things," I said presently, while she recovered.

"Why don't you go home and go to bed?"

The boy grinned.

"Phillipo sleep tonight," he said. "I stay wake, no sleep. To mo'ow night I sleep."

"You poor child!" cried Harriett.

"Do you mean to say you stay up all night?"

He nodded.

"Yeb! Stay up alla night!"

A bell clanged clearly through the frosty air and we hurried to reach the further crossing in time to signal for the car.

His name was Giovanni, but they called him Jo. He was from Italia. Yes. He came over alone. "Christopher Colombo. You know him?" he questioned Harriett. "He from Italia too. He discover this country, eh?"

These and other things we learned from Giovanni during his regular afternoon calls. For from the hour of the date episode, he burned his incense at Harriett's shrine. During the winter he gave her generous glimpses of his white teeth and a cordial "How do!" whenever she passed.

But it was in the springtime when Philippo sent him out to travel up and down the streets selling fruit, that his attentions began in earnest.

"Wanta any banan? Wanta any peach?"

This was the signal for attack and if Harriett was not in sight his invariable query was:

"Miss Townly here? She no wanta any banan?"

Harriett's orders were so strict that he never missed seeing her. They held long conversations while the old, bony, white horse, stood patiently in the street. And Giovanni confided to Harriett that Phillippo thought the sales by far too poor, and he called into requisition the persuasive end of the broomstick far too frequently Giovanni thought. His ideal was only to get by hook or crook enough "mon" to take him to "Santa Lona." "I got uncle in Santa Lona," was his favorite boast.

When I came back this autumn I found a strange void in the house of life which I at last discovered Giovanni had filled.

"Where is that dirty, little scamp you used to adore?" I asked Harriett one day.

"Gone to Santa Lona. Maka more mon," she answered despondently.
