MOTHERLY ADVICE.

How to Wash the Baby.

As a rule babies should be washed by hand. Machine-washed babies do not mature so rapidly, and being rubbed on a washboard is likely to wear holes in the baby.

The baby should be put to soak over night in luke-warm water in which has been dissolved a handful of pearlina. This takes the place of the old fashioned way of leaving him in a wash-boiler on the stove for three or four hours, and saves much labor.

In the morning, after rinsing in three waters, add a little ball blue to the last and pass the baby quickly through it.

Too much bluing is apt to give the baby a faded look.

We do not think that babies should be put through the wringer too soon after washing. Better results are obtained by hanging them on the line at once, if it be a sunny day. Otherwise they may be hung up before the kitchen fire, and, when thoroughly dry, starched and ironed at your convenience.

Type-Writers and Their Employers.

Many a young girl who has entered on her career as a type-writer has, through ignorance, made mistakes which, if warned in time, she would have avoided.

Type-writers should invariably be kind to their employers. It must be remembered that they are men after all, and that an occasional kind word will do much to lighten the cares of a busy day.

You will add brightness to your surroundings if every day on your way to the office, you stop at the florist's and get a dozen or two American Beauties or a couple of bunches of violets to place on your desk. At the close of the day you can put a flower in your employer's buttonhole. This is a little attention which his wife is bound to appreciate.

Always hum a tune when at your work. Type-writing to rag-time accompaniment is apt to bore your employer.

If he is in the habit of swearing at your mistakes, do not rebuke him before the office-boys as it might hurt his feelings.

Find out when his birthdays occur and mark the event by giving him a bottle of champagne or a box of cigars. An employer always appreciates thoughtfulness on the part of his typewriter.

Do not wear a decollete gown in the office. You might catch cold, and your coughing would annoy your employer.

If you bear these little suggestions in mind, dear girls, you will not only be successful in your business, but much happier in your daily life.—Life Buletique in the Home Journal.
